"I congratulate the people of the United States on the assembling of Congress at the permanent seat of their Government; and I congratulate you, gentlemen, on the prospect of a residence not to be changed."

It was to be a permanent seat of Government and a residence not to be changed. That was the idea that the President of the United States had after all the conflict of that day in fixing this site for the capital. He congratulates Congress upon the fact that at last they had found a home; they had found a place where they could be, as it were, under their own vine and fig-tree, undisturbed by local legislatures or anything else.

"It is with you, gentlemen, to consider whether the local powers over the District of Columbia, vested by the Constitution in the Congress of the United States, shall be immediately exercised. If, in your opinion, this important trust ought now to be executed, you cannot fail, while performing it, to take into view the future probable situation of the territory for the happiness of which you are about to provide. You will consider it as the capital of a great nation, advancing with unexampled rapidity in arts, in commerce, in wealth, and in population; and possessing within itself those resources which, if not thrown away or lamentably misdirected, will secure to it a long course of prosperity and self-government."

The House of Representatives, in answer to that congratulation, responded in like terms. I need not read them. I need not read the proclamation of Washington establishing the seat of Government here. I know, sir, that we have done a great wrong. We have mutilated this capital that was the hope and desire of our fathers; we have suffered the enemy to approach to its very doors and threaten us any day by a fortification on Arlington heights that will overshadow your capital and threaten us perpetually, and will falsify the hopes of the fathers that we had established ourselves where no local interference could disturb us.

Sir, was that act of retrocession constitutional? I need not argue that question. Was there a statesman at the time the act was passed who came forward and said that what he was doing was constitutional? How have courts and lawyers and everybody else treated it since; and why? I need not argue it. You will see, if you go minutely into it, that the cession of this District was made originally by two States as a contemporaneous act, concurring in the same thing; for the act of cession of Maryland and the act of cession of Virginia were in the same language and at the same time, and made for the identical purpose of complying with the constitutional provision that enabled Congress to accept from the States a certain territory, not exceeding ten miles square, to be the capital of the nation, and to have jurisdiction over it in all cases whatsoever. In words the most ample that the English language could supply the Constitution conferred upon Congress jurisdiction forever "in all cases whatsoever," disavowing this District from the States to which it formerly belonged as perfectly as it could be done by human language; and when you make a retrocession of it you can make it just as well to the State of Ohio or Rhode Island as to Maryland or Virginia. All claim to it on the part of the States was gone. No lurking interest remained that would suffer them to come in and claim anything from it, but it was under the entire control and jurisdiction of the General Government in all cases whatsoever, and it was forever to remain there.

Now, sir, if these two States concurred in this grant, in one grand act, could one of them, without the consent of the other, receive back the grant? Could anything less than they who were authorized to make the original cession rescind and annul that cession? Is it not a general principle of law, that it takes the same power to undo and annul a contract or a cession that it does to make it? Can one do it without the consent of the other? Was Maryland consulted on the subject of this retrocession to Virginia? Would not Maryland, had she been consulted, have said, "We made our cession upon the faith that Virginia had made hers, and both together granted such a site as we deemed proper for the capital of the nation?" Could one disavow it without the other? I say to you, no, sir; you could not do it without reversing every principle of law with which I am conversant. There is the reason going to the very root of the matter and showing that you only half did the work when you undertook to steal from the capital half of its territory. Virginia, rebellious, always ready and prompt to agree to undo all that the fathers had done, was willing at once to take back the cession.

Mr. HOWE. "Barkis is willin'."

Mr. WADE. Yes, sir; Barkis was willing. They were willing to take back the cession, if it could be made; but they were not willing to consent that loyal Maryland should say whether she who had concurred in the original design would consent that the retrocession should be made. She was not consulted at all; and therefore, for that, if for no other reason, your pretended retrocession was void, was a fraud upon one of the parties, and could not have been done.

Again, sir, how did you undertake to do it. I agree entirely with the Senators who have raised the constitutional question that a sovereign power cannot part with a sovereignty and transfer it to anybody. It cannot be delegated. That is the language of the law. This power cannot be delegated. It is a matter of confidence between the people and their representatives, and is not to be farmed out to anybody for any consideration whatever; and so the courts have decided as often as the question has arisen in the courts. What did they attempt to do here? The Senator from New York and the Senator from Nevada have interposed arguments that never can be met before any judicial tribunal in the world, because, first, they are founded in the reason of the thing, and secondly, upon a line of precedents unbroken from the foundation of the common law. Here was an attempt by a partisan Congress to cede, to give away, one half of the territory which had been acquired with so much care, so much circumspection, so much spirit of compromise in the fathers, without any ceremony, if the people on the other side would barely vote to take it. Why did you not consult all the people if you were going to consult anybody? Had the people on the Virginia side belonging to the District of Columbia any more right to speak on this subject than the people on this side of the Potomac? Were they not all one people combined for this purpose under the jurisdiction of the Government of the United States?

Mr. STEWART. Had those people any better right to determine the question than all the people of the United States?

Mr. WADE. No, sir; no better right than all the people of the United States or any of the people of the United States; but it was an utter absurdity to have an election of the people of the District and consult them to see where they would go, and leave them with a sovereign power, legislating and determining this great question by a vote of the people—an act as transitory as a flash of lightning, where no record is to be left, no track to be followed up. You do not know to-day whether the ballot-boxes were stuffed or whether the vote was legal or illegal. It is not in this transient way that jurisdictions over peoples are to be transferred. Sir, you would hardly sell a horse on such a contract as that; and yet your idea is that you may transfer, not only your jurisdiction over a territory given you, but give away the people with it as though they were dumb beasts subject to be sold from one jurisdiction to another. Sir, that is not an American idea. It may do in a despotism; but certainly nothing less than the sovereign power of the United States was necessary to make the transfer of the free people of the United States, if anybody could do it. I have argued and attempted to show that it could not be done, especially that it could not be done without the concurrence of all that combined to do the act, and yet Congress undertook to single out a portion of the people of the District and say, "We will vote away the sovereignty of this Government that was conferred by all the States under the Constitution, and we leave it to a town meeting to say whether all this shall be annulled." The absurdity is most apparent. No statesman ever dreamed of such a power, and if such a power exists, you hold your liberties upon a more feeble tenure than we ever supposed.

Mr. President, I am in earnest upon this subject because I am impressed with its transcendent importance. It is not like much of our legislation, a matter of a day or an hour. While we are gradually preparing this great capital to be the magnificent city of the world, where freedom and new forms of government shall be held up as a beacon light to entice the whole world to abandon the absurdity of their old Governments and come over to us, while we are preparing in this magnificent city to raise a Capitol commensurate with the growing greatness and grandeur of this great people, we are suffering the old disloyal statesmen of old Virginia, backed by a few of their copperhead associates over there, to take it all away. It will not do, sir. We are bound to undo what they have so ignominiously done. I wonder that the statesmen of Virginia had not more reverence for the great men of the preceding age, who, in view of the growing greatness and glory of this nation, had laid the foundation for the magnificence of its capital commensurate with all that it was to be hereafter, than to throw it away as a thing unworthy to be taken. They had no right to do it.

The law of 1846, for the reasons that I and other Senators have given, is utterly void. It was a nefarious attempt, not only to give away the magnificence of your capital and to give away its power of defense against an enemy, but it was a mean and contemptible attempt to mutilate and destroy that which the great statesmen of Virginia had contended for so so long and so earnestly. The act was void. Everybody adjudges it to be void, except my colleague on the committee, the Senator from Missouri, who thinks that it was undoubtedly and unquestionably one of the best acts that was ever established in the world. Sir, there is no question that it was a mere abortion, and would not stand the investigation of a court or a jury or a legislative body for a moment.

The Senator says, then why not go to law about it? Why not turn around to your courts? Sir, what kind of courts have we had? Dred Scott decision courts; courts in which justice was a mockery and freedom a burlesque till the present time, or nearly till the present time. In ancient times who would have thought of bringing such a question as this, which was devised and born in sin and iniquity, born of that spirit of disloyalty that has spread over the southern land and infected all their statesmen, before a court? And yet we are asked, why did you not do it twenty years ago? Sir, I would prosecute the devil in his dominions as quick as I would expect justice in such a court as that. This is the reason why the loyal people of this District over there have suffered themselves to be sold out by a void law, which is a mockery in the sight of justice and liberty. They knew they could not appeal to any court that would uphold them. Your court that decided the case of Dred Scott, a court under the domination of a narrow partisanship that forbade any man to seek justice at their hands—you ask me why they did not seek it there. Sir, it was not necessary that they should do so. This act was done in defiance of justice, right, and liberty, and in favor of secession and revolution. It must be undone. This magnificent capital, which was providently fixed and provided for us that we and those who shall come after us may rest secure from all outward oppression or interference, must not be granted away, must not be mutilated, must not be handed over to any other jurisdiction. The majesty and the dignity of Congress require that we, the defenders of our own capital and of our own legislative Hall, shall not hand it over to be settled by courts anywhere. It is undignified and wrong. If Congress heretofore has passed an unconstitutional law, we will wipe it out, and let those who oppose our act go to court, after we have put those affected by it right, and not leave them with this burden of sin upon them to overcome in order to get into court. Let us sweep it away, and then let those who oppose our action prosecute in the courts.

Now, sir, I hope Congress will vindicate its own jurisdiction. I hope it will vindicate the providence of our ancestors. I hope that we shall not fail, so far as legislation is concerned, to put these most wronged and injured people back into the condition in which they were before they were sold out by secession and rebellion. We owe it to them to do so. If there are any Union men there who were opposed to the secession of that State, and if we, the Congress of the United States, have brought this trouble upon them without their fault, should not a better Congress in a more enlightened age remove this act from them? Then if those who oppose the repeal wish to litigate the question before the judicial tribunals, let them do so; but let us reinstate the people there in the same condition that they were in before the act of retrocession was passed.

Mr. SAULSBURY. Mr. President, it is always to be regretted that in the discussion of questions involving principles of law, whether that discussion takes place in courts of justice or in legislative bodies, feeling should become excited and passion engendered. Such questions ought always to be approached in calmness and coolness of mind, and all extraneous influences and considerations should be avoided in the discussion. In a discussion of this kind, which involves principles and interests of some magnitude, it is proper that we should bend our minds to the proper considerations which necessarily arise in it. In the discussion of this question, whether it is proper, in the first place, to repeal the act of 1846 retroceding a portion of the District of Columbia to the State of Virginia, and in the second place, whether we have the power to do it, almost every subject has been brought in. We have been told that the object of procuring the act of retrocession was to set on foot this great rebellion, as it is called; that it was with the design to kindle up the flames of war; that twenty years and a day ago the people of Virginia and the people of the South were meditating the destruction of this great Government, and that more effectually to accomplish their purposes they procured from Congress the passage of an act retroceding about five miles extent of territory on the opposite shore of Virginia.

Mr. President, are great civil wars, are great rebellions which are to convulse a whole land, started by instrumentalities so feeble, so inefficient as that? Is it possible that a cool mind can believe that twenty years ago there were plotters throughout the southern States to destroy the fabric of this Government, and that in their cogitations, with all their wisdom as statesmen, they could devise no better or more efficient instrumentality as a beginning in the work of mischief than to pass a retrocession of a few acres of land on the opposite side of the Potomac? Why, sir, twenty years ago I do not suppose there was a man in the State of Virginia that dreamed of anything like a disruption of the Union or that desired it. Virginia—noble, ancient, glorious Virginia—glorious in her ruins, glorious in her historic fame, glorious in the illustrious names that adorn her annals, glorious in the work which her statesmen did in laying the deep foundations of the Republic, covered all over with the glory of revolutionary times—she plotting the destruction of that temple of liberty which her own sons reared!

Sir, I approve not the action of the State of Virginia when she attempted to secede from the Federal Union; I indorse no such action as that; but even now her sons may look upon her wasted fields, upon her ruined and dilapidated houses, and they may feel proud that they had their birth-place on a soil consecrated to freedom and a soil which gave birth to the noblest spirits that ever adorned the annals of American history. While the name of Washington shall endure, while Madison shall be remembered, while the name of the author of the Declaration of Independence shall be cherished, and while the other worthy names which have adorned the annals of that State and illustrated its history shall be remembered, the sons of Virginia may feel a noble pride that they are the inheritors of their fame and that Providence has vouchsafed to them the blessing to be born on the same soil.

Sir, twenty years ago Virginia contemplated no such movement as that of secession or revolution. When, in 1832, a sister State attempted, not to secede, but to annul an act of the Federal Government, who sent the messenger of peace? Whose son was deputized to go down to the refractory State and act as mediator between the Federal Government and that State? It was then that the statesmen of Virginia, ardent in their attachment to the Federal Union, devoted to the cause and to the principles of constitutional liberty, sent a Lee and said to South Carolina, "Stay your hand; attempt not that which may engender strife and lead to war." She was the State that said, "Let there be peace." And when the madness and the folly of fanaticism, when the fell demon of abolitionism had again brought this country to the verge of destruction, and when maddened men in the North and maddened men in the South were coöperating together for the accomplishment of a common purpose, the dissolution of the Union, it was then that Virginia again, through the action of her noble statesmen, said, "Let there be no strife between us, for we are all brethren;" and, after having first invited the other States of the Union to meet in this capital in a peace convention, she sent her noblest men here to save your Federal Union, to act in conjunction with patriotic men from every State of the Union. It was no fault of hers that war came. It was no fault of hers that constitutional liberty was broken down in this country. It was no fault of hers that war raged through the South. From the very foundations of your Government—ay, sir, before the foundations of your Government were laid—to the time when the fatal step of secession was taken, the example of that noble old Commonwealth was an example worthy of the imitation of all her sister States, and her statesmen stood a head and shoulders above the statesmen of any other State in this Union. And now that the foot of power grinds her to the dust, now that her sons are denied a representative upon this floor, now that her people have no one here to plead her cause or to assert her rights, it becomes those who admire her noble history and the glorious example which she has given to her sister States to stand up and defend her character when assailed.

But, sir, I did not intend to go into any eulogium upon the character of the State of Virginia. Whatever of political science I have learned, whatever of the true principles of constitutional liberty I have learned, I have learned from the writings and the teachings of the statesmen of Virginia. Her noble doctrine of State rights, now derided, is a glorious heritage which her early statesmen left to the present times. He who studies the principles of constitutional law aright, and who studies the principles in which the foundations of this Government were laid correctly, will recur, in all after time, to the sages of Virginia for proper enlightenment and proper instruction.

Mr. President, two questions naturally arise in the consideration of this subject. One is, is there any necessity for the repeal of this act? That is independent of all questions of the constitutionality of the act retroceding a portion of the District of Columbia to the State of Virginia. Has the Federal Government any use for that portion of what formerly belonged to the District of Columbia lying south of the Potomac? I have not heard what use they are going to make of it. They do not want it for the purpose of erecting any public buildings upon it. When they get it they do not propose to do a thing with it, except, I suppose, to give it the benefit of congressional legislation. From such benefits, good Lord deliver them! It is not contended that that portion of the District of Columbia which is still retained under the control of Congress is not sufficient for all the purposes of the national Government.

But it is said there are patriots over there who, with longing eyes, are looking to you as their deliverers from the oppression under which they groan by the action of the authorities of Virginia. I hope they are all patriots. Those who were not secessionists I hope are patriots now, although there is many a man who did not go into secession who is as big a traitor as those who did. Those who coöperated with them by their legislative action, by their political action, and did that which necessarily led to the same result, are in the same category with them. If there are any there who were secessionists, I think they have got a lesson they will never forget. I think they will never try that game any more. I think they are about as well reconstructed as you can possibly reconstruct men. I have seen no evidence in Virginia or elsewhere of any disposition on the part of the people again to attempt any opposition to any rightful Federal authority. I believe that you might remove every soldier out of the southern States to-day and there would not be a disturbance of the public peace, with the exception of those casual disturbances which occur everywhere. No, sir; that is not the spirit of the people of Alexandria; nor is it the spirit of the people of the South. When the southern people said, "We submit to the arbitration of the sword; we struggled for the accomplishment of a purpose, and we have failed; you have been too strong for us on the field of battle; we give our word of honor that we shall not renew this contest; that in future we will obey the laws of the Federal Government, and support the Constitution of the United States," I want no oaths from them; I want no other security. I know their high character as men of honor, and that is all the security that I want.

Mr. POMEROY. I ask the Senator if he remembers the speech that he made at the beginning of the war in which he assured the Senate and the country that the war was not waged for peace; that the South never would surrender to our arms; and that the only way to secure peace was by concession and compromise and kindness. That the war would prove a failure was the language of the Senator, if I recollect aright.

Mr. SAULSBURY. I am very glad the Senator from Kansas has reminded me of what I said in the commencement of this war. I have said a great many good things which I had forgotten, and that is one of them.

Mr. POMEROY. I understand the Senator to say now that the war did produce the very result which he said then it would not produce.

Mr. SAULSBURY. I did say that war was no way to settle this difficulty. I say so now. You have overcome the physical strength of the South, but you have struck down constitutional American liberty. When I said that war was no way to accomplish your purposes, I had in contemplation the preservation of the American Union with the constitutional rights of the people of every State in the Union preserved.

Mr. POMEROY. I understand the Senator now to say that he knows of no men in the South, or no considerable number of men, who are averse to the Union, but they accept the situation. I do not know but that he went so far as to say that they would rejoice in it. At any rate, he said that they accepted it; they are reconciled to it; they acquiesce in it, and have been brought to that result by the war.

Mr. SAULSBURY. If the gentleman will just be easy and quiet for a moment, I will explain it all to him, so that he who runs may read. The Senator has been so polite as to remind me of my record. I did not know that the record of so humble a Senator had attracted the attention of so distinguished a one; but, sir, I hold that there is a perfect symmetry in my record. This is a digression not occasioned by me, because the Senator has referred to my record and I must rejoice.

Sir, when, in 1860, it was apparent to every one that unless there could be some terms of compromise or agreement between the contending sections war was inevitable, I said that war was not the proper mode of settling your differences; that you ought not to be wiser than your fathers; that you ought in an emergency of that kind when you saw that war was inevitable, a war which you—I do not refer to the Senator individually, but I speak with reference to the political opinions of those who acted with him—helped to bring about by advocating doctrines which you knew if practically carried into operation would of necessity lead to a dissolution of the Union; when men advocating those sentiments, and men advocating just as foolish things down in the Gulf States, all coöperating for the accomplishment of the same purpose; when men with inflamed passions and maddened brains in both sections of the country were striving to bring about a dissolution of the Union, it was then, when you determined that if the South undertook to secede you would invoke the sword and the cannon, that I said that was no way to preserve the Union. I did not say just at that time, although I believe I did say it afterwards, that you could not conquer the South, and I did think at one time that you never could. I believe that if they had been all in earnest, if they had all gone into it, that that people could not have been conquered even by all your importations from foreign countries. That people fought the whole world. I am glad that the Union is not dissolved. I am glad the South did not bring about a separation of the country. I am just as glad of it as you are. I never wanted to see a separation of the country. But I said then as I say now, that war was no way to preserve the Federal Union; and I say now, sir, that you have not preserved the Federal Union. You have destroyed it temporarily. Its restoration will have to be the work of men entertaining principles like the founders of the Government. If it is ever restored, it will have to be restored by the action of that good old great Democratic party that studied the master minds of American history.

Talk about preserving the American Union with twenty-two vacant seats upon this floor and eleven States not represented here! The Constitution of your country says that each State shall be entitled to two Senators, and provides for membership in the other House from each State. And yet, sir, you come here, two thirds of the American Union, you call yourselves the Congress of the United States, and you shut and bar the doors against whom you please. The southern States are perfectly reconstructed for the purpose of sending constitutional amendments to them that they may vote upon them; but when they propose to come here to participate in making the laws by which they as well as you are to be governed, they are not reconstructed exactly; you do not know exactly whether they are in the Union or not!

You have succeeded in conquering the physical force of the South; and I am glad that they have submitted—as glad as you are. I have as much interest in the preservation of the Federal Union as you have. My ancestors have lived upon this continent as long as yours have. You have children to live here after you and so have I. Therefore I am glad from the bottom of my heart that the country has not been separated by any geographical line. Otherwise, I say in response to your question, you have not preserved the American Union. You have struck down constitutional liberty wherever you could lay your hands upon it. In carrying on your war, which you might have avoided by peaceable measures in adjusting your differences as your fathers did, there was no principle of constitutional liberty which you and those who acted with you did not ruthlessly lay your hands upon and utterly destroy; and this day you yourselves say that the Union is not restored.

But, sir, this is a digression. When interrupted by the Senator from Kansas I was coming to the consideration of the two points only involved in this case.

Mr. POMEROY. I do not like to interrupt the Senator and never do interrupt any one; but I do not understand the Senator now to say whether he was wrong when he said that the war was no road to peace; that the South never would submit; or whether he is right now when he says that they have submitted, and that there is no part of the South anywhere that is not reconciled to submit to its condition. I have been here for five years with the Senator, and we never have had the South here since I have been here, and we were never supposed to be responsible for their not being here. We never sent them out; they went out of their own accord. If the way is not clear, it is their fault.

Mr. SAULSBURY. And wrongfully went out; I admit all that.

Mr. POMEROY. We are not to blame for it.

Mr. SAULSBURY. If the Senator understood me to say that the physical power of the South could not be overcome, and if I did say that, I was mistaken. It has been overcome. I have no doubt I have formed many erroneous opinions in my life, which subsequent events have proved to be erroneous; and, if I expressed any such opinion as that, it was erroneous. I say the physical power of the South has been overcome, although at one time I did not believe it ever would be, because I believed the people there were united and earnest; but they had the good sense, when they got whipped, to say so, and give their word of honor that they would observe the law and the Constitution of the United States in future, and I believe they will do it. I want no test oaths.

Mr. President, I shall now proceed to the only two points involved in this case. One is, is there any necessity for the passage of this act, whether the act retroceding that portion of Virginia called Alexandria to the State of Virginia was constitutional or not? I have heard but one reason assigned, and that was by the honorable Senator from Ohio, to whom I always listen with great pleasure, because I think he is one of those Senators who always says what he means, and means what he says. He says it boldly and frankly, and there is no dodging around questions with him. He assigns this reason, that it may be necessary for the defense of the capital, and he says that the Government experienced great difficulty in the early part of the late war because that portion of the District had been retroceded to Virginia. Let us look at the reason for a moment. How is it possible that the retrocession of that part of this District to Virginia could in any way affect the military operations of this Government? Why, sir, the armed forces of the confederacy were not within hundreds of miles of the Potomac bank until they removed their capital to Richmond; the country was all open. When the confederates fired upon the flag at Sumter, and the President of the United States called for volunteers, did he bring his volunteers here and station them in Washington, and keep them here and refuse to let them go over on the heights of Arlington? Did he wait until the confederates came up near the heights of Arlington before he sent his soldiers over there, and took possession of those heights? Not at all. They may have remained in Washington a few days; but it was but a very short time before they were in possession of Arlington heights and all that country, not only that portion which had been in the District of Columbia, I believe, but other portions of Virginia, and fortifications were erected. The forces of Virginia did not attempt to drive the Federal soldiery off; they could not have done it.

Suppose now that war should spring up between Virginia and the United States, do you suppose the United States would stop to ask the State of Virginia whether they should go on Arlington heights or not and fortify them again? No, sir. It could have had no possible effect, as to whom the eminent domain was in, Virginia or the United States; it did not make a particle of difference when there were armies to be marched; and for all purposes of defense you were just as secure with that portion of what was formerly the District of Columbia in the State of Virginia as you would have been if it were in the Federal Government, because though it be in the limits of the State of Virginia you hold the doctrine that you have got the right to send your armies into any State of the Union. You will not stop to ask the consent of the State.

But old Virginia, it is said, may plant her cannon on the opposite banks and batter down your capital. Why, sir, Virginia is not allowed to keep a standing army. How can she go to erecting fortifications? Is there no power in this Government, if Virginia were to undertake to rear fortifications with guns bearing on the capital, to prevent it? Where is your Army to tear them down? She is not allowed to keep an army or a navy, under the Constitution of the United States. This is the only reason assigned as I understand why it is necessary to annul the act of 1846, and that is no reason at all.

Then, Mr. President, it is a question of law. It is said that the act retroceding Alexandria to the State of Virginia was unconstitutional and void; and it is said to be unconstitutional and void upon two grounds: first, that Congress having accepted ten miles square, had no power to part with any portion of the land thus accepted. The honorable Senator from Maryland has argued that question so fully and satisfactorily that it is unnecessary for me to say a word on the subject. I agree with him in opinion entirely.

But, sir, it is said this is a legislative power, and a legislative power cannot be delegated. I admit the principle. Legislative power cannot be delegated. But the question arises here, is this a delegation of legislative power? If it is a delegation of legislative power, then I admit that the act retroceding this portion of the District to the State of Virginia is utterly null and void; but if it be not a delegation of legislative power, then the act is constitutional, and is not null and void.

What is the authority cited? In twenty years' practice at the bar I have frequently seen cases brought into court and cited which had very little to do with the subject; and I think that the case cited here has but very little to do with it. What was the act retroceding this portion of the District to Virginia? It was a solemn act of Congress. Congress enacted it, declared that Alexandria county should be retroceded to the State of Virginia, with the consent of the people of Alexandria, and afterward it provided that in case that consent was not given the law should be null and void. Does that make a delegation of legislative power? All the forms of legislative enactment were observed; but the going into operation of the act, so to speak, was to depend upon a contingency. There is nothing more common in legislation than that the legislative body enacts a law, but provides that in the happening of a certain contingency the law shall not be operative. It is so in all your school-district laws in almost every State in this Union; and in many other respects. The law was perfect. It is just the same thing in principle as if Virginia had been claiming $100,000 from the Government of the United States, and the Congress of the United States had passed an act declaring that $100,000 should be paid out of any money in the Treasury to the State of Virginia, provided that if A. B., who is hereby appointed arbitrator in the case, shall report that nothing is due to the State of Virginia, then this act shall be null and void. It amounts to that, and nothing more.

But the case cited was this: property was levied upon in the State of New York for the payment of a school tax; that tax was levied under a particular act of the Legislature of New York; suit was brought by the person whose property was taken to recover the value of the property so taken, and judgment given in favor of the plaintiff; the defendant took an appeal, and the judgment was affirmed. But why was it affirmed? Were the provisions of the act of New York the same as the provisions of the act of Congress in reference to the retrocession of that portion of the District of Columbia called Alexandria to Virginia? No, sir; but New York passed no law at all. The tenth section of her act declared:

"The electors shall determine by ballot at the annual election, to be held in November next, whether this act shall or shall not become a law."

It did not pass any law; it left it to the people to pass a law. The Congress of the United States did not leave it to the people of Alexandria to say whether the act of retrocession should become a law or not; but they said it was the law, and they provided that if the people of Alexandria did not wish to go under the jurisdiction of the State of Virginia, but wished to continue under the jurisdiction of Congress, in that contingency the law should not operate. It was a covenant. The act of Congress and the acceptance by the State of Virginia became a compact between Congress and the State of Virginia; the one to give and the other to accept a grant of land; and they agreed that that grant should be operative in case the people of Alexandria assented to it. The people of Alexandria did assent to it. The terms of the compact and the agreement between the Government of the United States and the State of Virginia were complete and perfect when that assent was made. And now, after twenty years' enjoyment of the benefits of that contract by both parties, one of the parties comes into this high court, if I may so speak, and attempts to avoid the performance of its part of the covenant and contract, and of its own motion, without consulting the other party, attempts to annul its agreement upon the ground that the high contracting party now attempting to annul it had no right or authority to enter into the compact.

Sir, if the Congress of the United States had no authority to enter into this compact or agreement, there is a tribunal known to the law that can test the matter. Why should one party step in and say, "We absolve ourselves from all the obligations of this contract and will not consult you about it" when there is an impartial tribunal open alike to each party? Why should this Government undertake to tear its seal from the bond without consulting the other party to the bond? It is seen now, even in the Senate of the United States, that Senators differ on the subject. Men, whose profession it has been to study the law, whose business it has been for years to try to master the principles of the law, differ in reference to the principles of law involved in this case. You have the distinguished Senator from Maryland, than whom no man stands higher in the legal profession in this country, expressing no doubt at all in reference to the constitutionality of that act; and you find the distinguished Senator from New York and others who have adorned the bench differing with him in opinion. There being this difference of opinion, then, what does propriety, what does justice say ought to be done? One party should not step in and undertake to determine it for itself, but it should appeal to a tribunal which stands impartial as between the parties. The case should go to the courts as it now stands, without either party attempting to alter the status of the case. Do that and I have no doubt the people of Alexandria will be satisfied.

We have been told that the mass of the people of Alexandria are in favor of this bill. I have but very little acquaintance in the city of Alexandria, and was never there but once in my life; but I have met with gentlemen from there since this bill has been before Congress, and they tell me very differently indeed. Of the persons born on the soil, the real inhabitants of the place, I am told that nine tenths, if not more, are opposed to the passage of this bill. We all know that since the war people have gone from other sections and squatted about temporarily wherever they thought there was a chance to make money. They are birds of passage, here to-day and gone to-morrow—men flowing all over with patriotism, and wanting to change the condition of the people among whom they go. Such persons may want to enjoy the benefits of a congressional government; but I am told that the substantial men, the native inhabitants of the place, are utterly opposed to this measure. If you pass this act, do not pass it with a view of punishing those people. Heaven knows they have suffered enough. Allow your citizens, and the other citizens who are there temporarily, or who are there permanently, to go to an adjoining room in this Capitol, and there ask the judges of the Supreme Court of the United States what is the law in this matter, and I have no doubt both parties will be satisfied.

Mr. President, I have engaged the attention of the Senate much longer than I had intended. I had no idea when I rose of entering into questions of a political character, but somehow or other those questions are dragged into every subject which comes before the Senate, and I have been guilty of the impropriety of imitating an example which my judgment does not approve.

Mr. CONNESS. If there is no chance of getting to a vote on this bill to-night, I should like to call up some other business; and therefore I shall move to postpone the consideration of this bill at the present time.

Mr. WADE. I hope not. Let us dispose of it now.

Mr. FESSENDEN. Several of us want to make speeches on the subject.

Mr. WADE. I am in hopes of getting a vote on this bill to-day.

Mr. GRIMES. Let us have an executive session.

Mr. WADE. If you postpone this matter now, you will have this debate all over again. I hope if we can take a vote now that we shall be allowed to take it. If there is to be further debate I will not resist its postponement.

Mr. DAVIS. I should like to say a few words further on this bill. It is not my purpose to occupy much time; but I should like to engage the attention of the Senate for a few moments.

Mr. FESSENDEN. Let us have an executive session.

Mr. DAVIS. I have no objection to that. The PRESIDING OFFICER, (Mr. CLARK in the chair.) The bill is before the Senate as in Committee of the Whole.

Mr. CONNESS. I move that the further consideration of the bill be postponed until to-morrow.

Mr. WADE. I hope it will not be postponed, but that it will be left as the unfinished business to come up to-morrow. If we go into executive session, what is the object of postponing it?

Mr. CONNESS. I propose to postpone it in order to have an opportunity to take up some other business.

Mr. WADE. I object to that. I hope we shall not postpone this bill now to take up other business.

Mr. CONNESS. If the Senator from Ohio and the Senate will consent to lay this bill aside informally, so that I may call up a Senate bill that has been returned from the House of Representatives with amendments, for the purpose of acting on those amendments, I will then agree to go into executive session.

Mr. WADE. I have no objection to that.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Senator from California asks unanimous consent to lay aside the bill before the Senate and proceed to other business. Is there any objection?

Mr. HOWARD. I object until the Senator informs us what it is.

Mr. CONNESS. A California bill that was passed by the Senate, and has been returned from the House of Representatives with amendments.

Mr. HOWARD. Will it occasion debate?

Mr. CONNESS. No, sir; I merely desire to get action on the amendments made by the House of Representatives. It will take but a moment.

Mr. DAVIS. I wish to ask what has been done with the subject that was under discussion.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. It is before the Senate and at the control of the Senate.

Mr. DAVIS. Well, sir, I would as lief say what I have to say now as at any other time.

Mr. CONNESS. I move that the bill under consideration be postponed until to-morrow at one o'clock, and be made the special order for that hour. That will be equivalent to leaving it as the unfinished business, and the Senate can do as it pleases to-morrow.

The motion was agreed to.

LAND TITLES IN CALIFORNIA.

Mr. CONNESS. I now move to take up the measure which I have indicated.

The motion was agreed to; and the Senate proceeded to consider the amendments of the House of Representatives to the bill (S. No. 343) to quiet titles in California.

The first amendment was on page 1, line sixteen, section one, after the words "mineral land," to insert "or to any land held or claimed under any valid Mexican or Spanish grant;" so that the proviso will read:

Provided, That no selection made by said State contrary to existing laws shall be confirmed by this act for lands to which any adverse preemption, homestead, or other right has, at the date of the passage of this act, been acquired by any settler under the laws of the United States, or to any lands which have been reserved for naval, military, or Indian purposes by the United States, or to any mineral land, or to any land held or claimed under any valid Mexican or Spanish grant, or to any land which, at the time of the passage of this act, was included within the limits of any city, town, or village, or within the county of San Francisco.

The next amendment was on page 5, line nine, section seven, to strike out the words "conterminous proprietors."

The next amendment was on the same page, in section seven, line sixteen, after the word "office," to insert "joint entries being admissible by conterminous proprietors to such an extent as will enable them to adjust their respective boundaries; provided, that the provisions of this section shall not be applicable to the city and county of San Francisco; provided, that the right to purchase herein given shall not extend to lands containing mines of gold, silver, copper, or cinnabar."

The next amendment was in section eight, line five, to strike out the word "made" and insert "requested within ten months from the passage of this act."

The next amendment was on page 6, section eight, line eleven, to strike out the word "made" and insert "requested."

The next amendment was in the same section, lines twelve and thirteen, to strike out the words "six months after such final confirmation," and to insert "ten months after the passage of this act or any final confirmation hereafter made."

The next amendment was in the same section, line fifteen, after the word "the," to insert "expiration of ten months from the."

The next amendment was in the same section, line fifteen, after the word "confirmation," to insert "hereafter made."

The next amendment was to add at the end of section eight the following: "provided, that nothing in this act shall be construed so as in any manner to interfere with the rights of bona fide preemption claimants."

The next amendment was to add to section nine, at the end of the bill, the following proviso:

Provided, however, That from decrees of the district courts, as aforesaid, made after July 1, 1865, and prior to the passage of this act, an appeal may be taken to the United States circuit court for the State of California within one year from the approval of this act: Provided, That in any such case in which an appeal may be taken under the provisions of this section the said circuit court shall not be precluded by the terms of the decree of confirmation, or by reason of any clerical mistake therein, from determining the boundaries of the land claimed in accordance with the original grant and the real justice and merits of the case.

Mr. CONNESS. The amendments have been considered separately by the members of the Committee on Public Lands. I move that the Senate concur in all the amendments except the last one.

The motion was agreed to.

Mr. CONNESS. Now, in regard to the last amendment, I move that the Senate non-concur.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Chair will put the question in the affirmative, Will the Senate concur?

The amendment was non-concurred in.

UNION PACIFIC RAILROAD.

Mr. HOWARD. I move to take up for consideration Senate joint resolution No. 125.

The motion was agreed to; and the joint resolution (S. R. No. 125) granting the right of way through military reserves to the Union Pacific Railroad Company and its branches was considered as in Committee of the Whole. It proposes to grant, subject to the approval by the President, the right of way, one hundred feet in width, and the necessary grounds for depots, stations, shops, &c., to the Union Pacific Railroad Company and the companies constructing the branch roads connecting therewith, for the construction and operation of their roads over and upon all military reserves through which they may pass; and the President is also authorized to set apart to the Union Pacific Railway Company, eastern division, twenty acres of the Fort Riley military reservation for depot and other purposes in the bottom opposite Riley City; also fractional section one on the west side of the reservation, near Junction City, for the same purposes; and also to restore, from time to time, to the public domain, any portion of the military reserve over which the Union Pacific railroad or any of its branches may pass, and which shall not be required for military purposes; the same when so restored to be subject to existing laws concerning public lands, in the same manner that they would have been if the reserves had never been made; but the President is not to permit the location of any such railroad or the diminution of any such reserve in any manner so as to impair its usefulness for military purposes, so long as it shall be required therefor.

Mr. HOWARD. I wish to suggest a verbal amendment, to strike out the word "the" before "approval," in line three, so as to read, "subject to approval by the President."

The PRESIDING OFFICER. That amendment will be made if there be no objection.

Mr. BROWN. I rather think this joint resolution ought to be referred to a committee, or else we ought to have some explanation of it from the Senator who has presented it.

Mr. HOWARD. I do not deem it necessary to refer this joint resolution to any committee. It simply grants the right of way to the Union Pacific Railroad Company across military reserves wherever the line shall run through those reserves, under such rules and regulations as the President of the United States shall approve. It is necessary particularly in regard to the military reserve at Fort Riley. The company now at work there in constructing the eastern division of the Union Pacific railroad find it necessary to have such a law as this passed in order to enable them to pass through that reservation.

Mr. GRIMES. I inquire how much land is embraced in "fractional section one" on the west side of the Fort Riley military reservation "near Junction City."

Mr. HOWARD. I am not able to inform the Senator as to the exact amount, but no more is to be occupied by the road than is necessary for the accommodation of the line and its necessary buildings. Of course it will be for the Department to see to it that no more is taken than is absolutely necessary for the road.

Mr. SHERMAN. Has this resolution ever been referred to any committee?

Mr. FESSENDEN. It seems not.

Mr. HOWARD. I do not deem it necessary to refer it at this period of the session.

Mr. SHERMAN. The twenty acres of land granted at Fort Riley may be of immense value. It seems to me the resolution ought to be examined by a committee.

Mr. GRIMES. It not only grants twenty acres of land at Fort Riley, but it also grants a fractional section, which may be one hundred acres or six hundred acres. It certainly ought to go to the Military Committee, that they may let us know what the War Department has to say about the propriety of cutting up this military reserve. I make that motion, that the joint resolution be referred to the Committee on Military Affairs.

Mr. HOWARD. I hope it will not be referred.

Mr. CONNESS. It will not delay it materially.

Mr. HOWARD. It will delay it so that it will not be passed at this session. I hope the resolution will be passed at once without a reference.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The question is on the motion of the Senator from Iowa to commit the joint resolution to the Committee on Military Affairs and the Militia.

The motion was agreed to.

GEORGETOWN AQUEDUCT.

Mr. HENDERSON. I move to take up for consideration the bill (S. No. 395) relating to the aqueduct bridge of the Alexandria Canal Company over the Potomac river at Georgetown, in the District of Columbia.

The motion was agreed to.

Mr. GRIMES. I move now that the Senate proceed to the consideration of executive business.

The motion was agreed to; and after some time spent in executive session the doors were reopened, and the Senate adjourned.

HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES.

TUESDAY, July 10, 1866.

The House met at twelve o'clock m. Prayer by the Chaplain, Rev. C. B. BOYNTON.

On motion of Mr. RICE, of Maine, by unanimous consent, the reading of the Journal of yesterday was dispensed with.

PERSONAL EXPLANATION.

Mr. LE BLOND. I ask unanimous consent to make a personal explanation. There was no objection.

Mr. LE BLOND. Mr. Speaker, some days ago, after the honorable gentleman from Maryland [Mr. HARRIS] had concluded his very able speech in which he asserted the right of secession and that the States lately in rebellion were out of the Union and required an enabling act before they could be represented in Congress, I deemed it proper as a Democrat to repudiate the doctrine he enunciated. In doing so I said that the Democratic party differed from him as well as from the honorable gentleman from Pennsylvania [Mr. STEVENS] and his coadjutors. I said substantially that we held, before, during, and since the war, that a State once in the Union is always in, unless the bonds were broken by successful revolution.

On last Friday the honorable gentleman from Pennsylvania [Mr. STEVENS] rose to a personal explanation growing out of my remarks. It is difficult to determine whether the object of that explanation was to sugar-coat his offensive doctrine that it might be more easily taken by the people, or to relieve himself of a surplus of venom against the President which had accumulated during his brief illness. If the latter, I trust he has found relief, without, I am sure, doing the least injury to the Executive; but if the former, then he has added one more testimonial to the truth that an error needs constant support to make it believed by the people, while truth carries with it its own conviction to the heart of every man.

On the 4th of December, 1862, the gentleman from Pennsylvania introduced into Congress a series of resolutions, the first of which reads as follows:

"Resolved, That this Union must be and remain one and indivisible forever."

It will be remembered that at that time all the States had passed their ordinances of secession, armies were organized, and battles had been fought. If, then, their "declarations" carried them out, they were out before the honorable gentleman resolved that this Union "must remain one and indivisible forever." If he meant that their acts of war carried them out, then I say that their armies had not been overthrown, and there were better reasons for saying that the Union was dissolved than to say it now when they are completely disarmed. The "Union must remain one and indivisible forever," said the distinguished gentleman; and now, when the rebellion is overthrown, he says that the Union is severed and shall so remain until the sovereign will of his party decrees otherwise. But the honorable gentleman says in his explanation that—

"Because I have declared that the confederate States had by their acts and declarations placed themselves outside the Union (at our election) gentlemen have asserted that it admitted the right of secession. He is a very stupid man who cannot discern between the existence of a crime and its justification."

Sir, if these States are out of the Union they are out by the force of their ordinances of secession, and not by their acts of war, for in the latter they were finally unsuccessful. If out by their ordinances it must be because they had the reserved right to go out, and the gentleman from Maryland [Mr. HARRIS] and the gentleman from Pennsylvania [Mr. STEVENS] are right in asserting that they are out. A State acts through its representatives, and the representatives are circumscribed in their action by the constitution and laws of the State and the United States. The State constitution and laws are at all times subordinate to the Constitution and laws of the Federal Government. If then the representatives of these States exercised rightful authority in the passage of their ordinances of secession they are out by their declarations.

But, sir, the party to which I have the honor to belong holds the converse of the proposition to be true. They had no authority to pass any ordinance of secession, and not having any authority under the Federal Constitution or in the reserved rights of the States, those ordinances were a nullity, and leaves the Union, in the language of the gentleman from Pennsylvania [Mr. STEVENS] in his more patriotic days, "one and indivisible forever." But the gentleman says "he is a very stupid man who cannot discern between the existence of a crime and its justification." I grant it, and he must be more than stupid who will day after day assert that a State, a corporation, a thing without a soul, without a mind, without locomotion, can commit a crime and must be punished. Treason is the highest of crimes in all Governments; but who except the gentleman from Pennsylvania [Mr. STEVENS] ever heard of a State committing treason?

Imagine the honorable gentleman acting as a judge in the trial of the State of Virginia for treason. Grave, sedate, and dignified as he is, he sits upon the judicial bench surrounded by the sheriff, bailiffs, clerk, and a cordon of motley witnesses. He directs the sheriff to bring in the State of Virginia for trial upon an indictment for treason. How long, think you, Mr. Speaker, would the venerable judge wait for inanimate, soulless, speechless Virginia to come before the bar of the court to plead to the indictment? All admit treason to be a crime; but it can only be committed by individuals, not by corporations, not by States. All those who voluntarily took part in the rebellion are guilty of treason, and may be indicted, tried, and convicted, and there are none so stupid as not to be able to discern between the existence of the crime in an individual and its justification. But he who can conceive the idea that a State can commit the overt act of treason can "see what is not to be seen." The idea that a State can commit treason is an absurdity, and will require at the hands of the venerable gentleman from Pennsylvania daily personal explanations. Now, sir, let us draw a parallel, and I have done.

The honorable gentleman from Maryland [Mr. HARRIS] says the southern States are out of the Union by the exercise of their reserved rights, and the gentleman from Pennsylvania [Mr. STEVENS] says they are out of the Union by their "acts" and "declarations." The former says they have no right of representation, being out of the Union by virtue of the exercise of their reserved rights. The latter says they are out of the Union by their acts and declarations and are not entitled to representation. The former says that before they are entitled to representation they must be admitted into the Union. The latter says that they must be admitted into the Union by an enabling act before they are entitled to representation. I leave the public to determine the difference in effect, if any exist, between those two gentlemen. We believe that the ordinances of secession were nullities, and that the States were never out of the Union. The laws of the Federal Government were for a time suspended, but now they are enforced over every foot of territory and the people are entitled to immediate representation.

LEAVE OF ABSENCE.

The SPEAKER. The Chair has been requested by the gentleman from Maine, Mr. BLAINE, to ask leave of absence for him for the remainder of the session, on account of indisposition.

Leave was granted.

On motion of Mr. TROWBRIDGE, indefinite leave of absence was granted to Messrs. UPSON and BEAMAN.

TARIFF BILL.

The SPEAKER stated the first business in order was the unfinished business of yesterday, House bill No. 718, to provide increased revenue from imports, and for other purposes, reported on yesterday from the Committee of the Whole with amendments; upon which Mr. MORRILL was entitled to the floor.

Mr. MORRILL. I yield the floor to the gentleman from Illinois, [Mr. WENTWORTH.]

Mr. WENTWORTH. In revising the revenue system of this country, we should remember that the amount paid into our Treasury during the fiscal year ending the 30th June last, is the largest ever collected by any country. It nearly reaches $530,000,000. It is larger by $150,000,000 than Great Britain ever collected. And as we are acting upon the tariff it may be well to remember that we have collected from customs $170,000,000 in gold. Gold has averaged 140 through the year. Reducing this to legal tenders, and our imports have amounted to $238,000,000. As our custom revenues, however, have always been collected in gold, my calculations will all be in gold. Our receipts from customs before the war never reached $60,000,000 save in the years 1854, 1856, and 1857; and we all know that financial disasters followed, which were attributed by some to excessive importations under an erroneous tariff system. Indeed, they never reached $50,000,000 save in the additional years of 1853, 1855, and 1860. They were, in—

1862.....	49,000,000
1863.....	69,000,000

And this year they have reached $170,000,000; more than double those of last year and more than $100,000,000 in excess of any year but the last two of our governmental existence. Our Government is the greatest landed proprietor in the world in its own right, to say nothing of its interests in the land of its citizens yet undeveloped. Its lands, richer in their vegetable mold than the most highly cultivated lands of the Old World, abounding in the most valuable timber and water power, are given away to those who will cultivate them. And yet we are importing agricultural products. With the mechanic arts as highly developed as those of any country on the globe, we are patronizing foreign mechanics. Needing laborers, we are carrying work to foreign labor which starvation would drive to us if we did not go to it.

Here is a wrong which every one will admit should be remedied. And how shall it be remedied? Every one promptly replies, revise the tariff. But how shall it be revised? "Hic labor, hoc opus est." As President Johnson said of the word "veto," I would inform you, Mr. Speaker, that this is Latin, and, applied to the present day, means that nine members of this House, constituting the Committee of Ways and Means, cannot frame revenue bills to suit everybody. For six months have we labored more assiduously than any committee of this House ever did labor. We have been in session mornings, evenings, and holidays, and also during the sessions of the House. I have devoted so much attention to the subject of revenue that I have neglected to introduce a single constitutional amendment or to make a single reconstruction speech, although, like others, I have had several old ones on hand that might bear repeating. Nor have my colleagues upon the committee been very prolific in this respect. Yet we have all done our full share of voting; and the Washington Chronicle has come to the relief of such of us as were in danger of losing our status on the slavery question at home because we did not neglect the duties assigned to us to attend to those satisfactorily performed by others.

We labored long and patiently upon the internal revenue bill. But it did not satisfy this House. It was amended in important particulars. It then went to the Senate where it was amended in over six hundred particulars. The tariff bill now before us, the product of equal labor, is also unsatisfactory, and has been amended by the House. Manufacturers denounce it as a free-trade tariff. Commerce more strongly denounces it as a prohibitory tariff. Agriculture knows that in many respects it is neither, but regrets that it cannot make a tariff of its own. For while agriculture is the largest of all interests requiring the fostering care of Government, and does the most of the tax-paying in peace, and the most of the fighting in war, it has ever been, is now, and is likely to be, numerically the smallest of all interests in legislative assemblies. Yet farmers can judge more disinterestedly of the workings of the tariff system than can any other class of people. A revision of the tariff is called for as the panacea of the times. But if a man is very sick and calls a physician, he does not get much information when the physician says, take medicine. What medicine shall be taken, is the inquiry. What revision shall the tariff have, is our inquiry. To answer this let us take a fair start; let us find a section corner and survey from that.

First, we want revenue. And those means of revenue are the most popular which are the least felt in collection. I will not argue the comparative merits of free trade and protection now, because free trade is an absurdity unless all other nations favor it; and because our debt and interest are so excessive that we are now in no situation to favor it if other nations did. Our few years of experience in internal taxation demonstrates its injustice and oppression. That part of it which is inquisitorial is as odious as it is cruel. Aged people may object to a sinking fund, as they think it is enough for men of their age to be taxed for interest. But Young America will insist that the use of stamps, the inspection of private books, and the publication of annual losses and gains shall be stopped at the earliest possible period; and will endure the greatest privations to get our debt out of the way so that they shall be stopped. And I believe that the people will annually the more strongly insist that such a policy shall be adopted as shall require no more revenue in this annoying way than is absolutely necessary to pay our interest and gradually extinguish our debt. And the annually perceptible decrease of our interest will be an impetus to a liberal sinking fund and a consequent decrease of inspectors and inquisitors. With this policy we must pay as far as practicable the ordinary expenses of our Government from duties upon imports. And as those expenses in a time of peace will not vary much from year to year, we ought to be able to give all our industrial and business pursuits what they especially need, a comparatively stable tariff.

We can never expect the needed extension of manufactures to the West until capitalists have some greater assurance than they heretofore have had that the ground upon which they build at one Congress shall not be taken from under them at the next. We must have a permanent tariff policy. If we say that our custom duties shall equal our ordinary governmental expenses we have got a starting-point. It only remains then to say upon what articles these duties shall be raised, and how much shall come from luxuries, how much from necessities, and how much from articles coming in competition with those manufactured by ourselves. A commission composed of one farmer, one manufacturer, and one commercial man, upon the doctrine of compensation, could in time arrange all this, after an average annual amount has been agreed upon. The interests that would be represented by these three commissioners are inseparable in war as well as in peace. Commerce nurtures seamen; manufactures make the ships and the guns; and agriculture furnishes the rations. All I have in this country shares the fate of agriculture. I am a farmer, and I believe I could make a fair bargain for the farmers with the manufacturers when the amount to be raised shall be agreed upon. I should get the advantages of a home market, which is a great consideration in these days of tolls, transshipments, storage, and commissions. And if I saw an honest difference between them and myself about the tariff on hoes, spades, shovels, &c., I would insist upon compensation by having the duties reduced upon some of the foreign articles of prime necessity to the farmer. I could pay a little more for my cultivators and mowers if I could get my tea and coffee a little cheaper; and the increased demand for these foreign necessities would help commerce. Only fix the amount you want, live up to it in your appropriations, and let a sensible and honest commission apportion it to our various interests and localities, and the tariff would soon cease to be an apple of discord. In other words, take the tariff out of politics. Let politicians name the amount if you please, as our tax-ridden people will force them to economy. But let commerce, agriculture, and manufactures apportion it.

Is this scheme practicable? Before the war we had no internal revenue tax. We paid all our expenses from imposts, the public lands, and miscellaneous resources, and liquidated debts considered formidable in their day. The returns are not all in for the fiscal year ending with 30th June last, but they are near $530,000,000.

From customs.....	$170,000,000
From internal revenue.....	310,000,000
From miscellaneous.....	50,000,000
Exclusive of loans.....	$530,000,000

From this sum the Secretary of the Treasury had reduced the public debt to 1st June $87,000,000, and paid interest about $142,500,000. But as the miscellaneous receipts are so largely creditable to sales of useless war materials, and as so many expenditures are chargeable to the war, I prefer to estimate by the present year, beginning July 1. In his estimate for this year the Secretary calls for $284,000,000 for expenditures. But this Congress has so exceeded his estimates that he will want $800,000,000 for expenditures. To meet his expenditures he estimates the following receipts:

Customs.....	$100,000,000
Internal revenue.....	275,000,000
Miscellaneous.....	21,000,000

This will leave $96,000,000 to apply upon the public debt. But without a change of the tariff this estimate will be too low for customs. There is no reason without that change why they should not go on as they are now going. But if we call them $139,000,000, and our miscellaneous as above, $21,000,000, we have $160,000,000. This will pay all the ordinary expenses of Government. For the Secretary wants $300,000,000 in all, and of this he wants $140,000,000 for interest, which I propose to pay out of the internal revenue fund, and then we can either reduce the internal revenue fund to $140,000,000, or we can set apart the surplus for a sinking fund.

Now, if you revise the tariff, you must have some regard to a revenue basis. How much do you want to raise by it? We will say $140,000,000. To this add your receipts from lands and all other sources usually denominated miscellaneous, and you have $160,000,000. And this is all the money we want for ordinary expenses of Government. The balance goes for interest, $140,000,000, which would be all that we should require from internal sources if we pay nothing for the liquidation of our debt. Cannot the tariff be so revised as to produce a sum like this, on an average, for the next four years, taxing heavily luxuries, lightly necessities, and everywhere encouraging domestic industry, thus making both a revenue tariff and a protective tariff? For these interests have got to be compromised, and the sooner the better for both parties. Indeed, I have taken particular pains among the large number of manufacturers who have come before our committee this session to inquire if they would not prefer a revision of our present very unfair tariff upon principles that would so bring revenue with additional protection as to give them a reasonable hope of an early deliverance from the annoyance of the stamps, the inquisitors, and the spies that are a necessity from our internal taxation system. I have received but one response, and that has been, God speed the day!

With $140,000,000 (being $30,000,000 less than this year) from the tariff, and with $20,000,000 from miscellaneous sources, let us see where our internal revenue tax will land us at the end of this fiscal year.

But, while I have assumed $160,000,000 for the ordinary expenses of Government, I protest against any such extravagance. With our currency placed upon an honest basis, the ordinary expenses of Government should never exceed $100,000,000. I also protest against the assumption of the gentleman from Pennsylvania, [Mr. STEVENS,] that our debt will yet be increased to $4,000,000,000. If almost any one else had made such an assumption I should have inferred that he was in favor of paying the rebel debt. But I suppose he means our debt is to be increased by paying for the losses to loyal men from rebel sources. When this subject comes up it will be found that losses of health, of life, and of limb, will have to be taken into consideration as well as losses of fences, of garden vegetables, of haystacks, peach orchards, buildings, &c. It is lamentably true that many persons suffered greatly from losses of property. But how inestimably greater were the losses of those who risked their all to defend such property. When a commission is appointed to estimate the losses of this war, the cripples, the orphans, and the widows must be heard; for our pensions are wholly inadequate.

The Secretary of the Treasury, at the commencement of this Congress, estimated $275,000,000 from internal revenue. Our legislation will vary this somewhat, as well as uncontrollable circumstances. For instance, the income tax returns (being last year $58,000,000) show a falling off of about thirty per cent., or $17,000,000. Then from the reduction of prices and decrease of business attendant upon the close of the war we must estimate a loss of about forty million dollars. We have added largely to the free list. The loss therefrom is estimated at $65,000,000. This makes a total of $102,000,000 to come from $275,000,000, leaving $173,000,000 of the Secretary's estimate. And as we want but $140,000,000 for our interest, (the tariff and miscellaneous having paid all other expenses,) we should have left $33,000,000 to apply upon the liquidation of our debt in this case.

But I believe the legislation of this Congress upon internal revenue will largely increase this amount, although we did not need the increase except for a sinking fund. Now that the cotton tax is out of the woods I can safely say this. It will be remembered that this House put the cotton tax at five cents. The Senate begrudgingly put it at two cents. We had to compromise on three cents. Commissioner Wells estimates that we will raise $7,000,000 from this source; from our more stringent whisky law $25,000,000, and from the new law upon legacies, successions, tobacco, licenses, &c., $18,000,000. This would make $45,000,000 from new legislation. Add this to the former $33,000,000 and we have $78,000,000 to apply upon our national debt, with a tariff yielding $140,000,000. But will this tariff yield $140,000,000? It is the highest ever even asked for, even with gold at par. To the duties asked for in this bill what shall we add for the difference between gold and currency? During the last fiscal year gold has averaged 140. With gold at less than 125 Government cannot convert its seven-thirty notes. This guaranties at least twenty-five per cent. to the duties provided for in the bill. The Secretary is prohibited by law from reducing the currency fast enough to keep gold even at this point. Supposing gold averages the same as last year, then the duties, unprecedentedly high in the bill even for currency, are raised forty per cent. What is gold to be the present year? What landmarks have we? Where is the plummet for our soundings, or the polar star for our direction?

And here is a breaker in sight. We have near one hundred million dollars of goods in bond. The gold duties due upon them will average $40,000,000. These duties are due one year from the date of the bond at any rate. If this bill pass, these goods must either be taken out of the country or pay this $40,000,000 before the bill goes into effect, or be subject to the new duties, which are greatly increased. And large orders have been given out and some of the goods are on the way. Now, we know that the Secretary of the Treasury has the most of the gold in the country, and if he should sell, judging by the past, it would go abroad quite as fast as he would sell. To meet this $40,000,000 and all other gold demands, good judges say that there is not $10,000,000 in the market. Some limit it to less. And the Secretary of the Treasury is daily making drafts upon this, while the gold interest of July is already paid. If this bill passes in its present shape, may not gold go to 100, and thus all the duties be doubled until a reduction of imports shall reduce its price?

Does this bill tend to revenue, to protection, or prohibition? The two former I want. The latter I oppose, as among other evils it will prolong the abominations attendant upon the internal revenue system. Upon many of the items in the bill I know nothing save from the statements of the numerous gentlemen of great tact who have appeared as interested parties before the committee, and the adverse comments upon them since the bill has been published. I wish I could be convinced that the duties would be productive of revenue as well as protective in all cases; for I know that the interests of agriculture and, in fact, of all industrial pursuits require a change of the present law. With so much unimproved land as we have we ought to induce, by all practicable means, foreign cultivators to emigrate here. Our manufacturers, too, see the necessity of inviting foreign laborers, especially skilled laborers, here in greater numbers than sufficient to make good the half million we lost in the war. I want to see American legislation fraternize with American industry. I want to see American farmers patronize American manufacturers, and American manufacturers in turn patronize American beef, pork, mutton, wool, flax, flaxseed, &c. We are daily told that to enrich and populate our country we must labor to diversify American pursuits. This is the truth, and it is equally true that we should diversify agriculture. For, while it is true that we cannot all be farmers, it is equally true that all farmers cannot depend upon the same crop. We cannot all be growing cereals and prosper.

Does this bill tend to diversify agriculture? Are its advantages equivalent to its burdens upon agriculture? For, if the bill is not satisfactory to the manufacturers of all kinds it has not been for the want of effort on their part, nor for the want of an appreciation of their real necessities on the part of the committee. And I will leave the great interests of commerce to those who so ably represent it on this floor, and who are better able to speak for it than I am. I will speak for the few agriculturists on this floor, and yet in behalf of the most numerous interest in the country. "Ne sutor ultra crepidam." As the President told us about the word "veto," I tell you again, Mr. Speaker, that here is Latin, and it means, in this case, let a man only talk upon what he best knows.

Our chairman, in his opening speech, has alluded favorably to the provisions concerning wool, as being an honorable compromise between the wool-growers and the manufacturers of wool. From his stand-point, where the wool is near the manufacturers, his views may be correct. He resides in a State where every acre of land is inclosed and used to its full capacity; where it commands the highest price, and where land is so scarce to the wants of its ever enterprising inhabitants that his State is daily sending out emigrants who never fail wherever they plant their feet to become models in industry, in enterprise, in morals, and in everything else that tends to advance and adorn a State. Vermont sheep, owing to the untiring skill of her breeders, have added more to her credit than her renowned Morgan horses, whose fleetness for short distances may have occasionally been surpassed, but whose patient endurance, like that of our chairman, is proverbial. It was her Campbell, who after a series of triumphs at American State fairs, took back the American descendants to the Old World, and at the World's Fair, amid the competition of nations, heard plaudits from connoisseurs of every clime as the righteous judge tied the triumphal ribbon around the emblems of innocence from the Green Mountain State. It was then that her enterprising breeder, more worthily than the Emperor Alexander, could cry because he had no more to conquer. This triumphant is to Vermont wool and Vermont sheep, embracing all their numerous descendants in all the States of the Union, almost a guarantee against competition. And here is a proper place for me to indorse all our chairman has said respecting the superior strength and durability of cloth made from American wool. If there were means of always designating it, those having investigated the merits of the domestic and foreign article would always purchase the former. But as there are not, I think it fully needs all the protection given it by this bill, which I consider hardly equal to that given to the manufacturers of wool. Yet fairness requires me to say that I am leaving out the advantages of a contiguous wool manufactory, which the western wool-growers, oppressed with high freights, high fares, high tolls, and high commissions, with the tedium of frequently breaking bulk and an unstable currency, greatly need, and which protection is designed to secure to them; and I believe the new States can never get their needed manufactories of any article until protection from foreign competition shall excite a greater competition at the East, when our abundant water, cheap breadstuffs, and recently developed coal-fields will incite them West. I would, however, have made but one class of wool, and fixed but one rate of duty thereon. I would have given the poorest quality of wool the same protection as the best. For the whole doctrine of protection implies that the moment you depart from the strict revenue point it must be to encourage the new and struggling industries rather than the old and well established. France, with her densely-settled land, finds it for her interest to keep one sheep to the acre. England one to every three acres. We, with our millions of acres of waste lands, have scarcely a sheep for every thirty acres. Under our past unfavorable tariff, dictated by the manufacturers at the East, our fine wool interest, constantly improved by the skill of American breeders, has extended itself quite as well as could have been expected. It would do much better under the tariff bill now before us.

Our mutton-sheep interest, or what is more generally known as the South Down or middle-wool interest, owing to low duties, and more especially to the reciprocity treaty has had but a slight extension, and then only among farmers who kept them for their own eating. Many manufacturers, while noted for their clamor for the protection of their own fabrics from foreign competition, have gone to Canada for their mutton, and to South America, Egypt, and Syria for their wool. This interest greatly needs all the protection that is given it, and it will require more honest valuations than are generally secured and more honest and shrewder appraisers than are generally appointed to render that protection effective. The great popularity of American beef naturally increases its foreign demand, while the desolations of the rinderpest have for years removed it from competition in the Old World. To all this add the havoc of the American war, and the awful fact stares us in the face that henceforth good beef is to be denied to the poorer operative classes save as an occasional high-priced luxury. The laborer may successfully strike for higher wages and fewer hours. But he vainly strikes for that strength and that endurance which animal food furnishes as things now are, the late Dr. Graham to the contrary notwithstanding. Physiology and all animal economy teach but one lesson upon this subject. You can have health but not strength without animal food. Ask the octogenarian sailor who has rioted all his life upon an ocean full of fish for his opinion upon this subject, and he will tell you that he had rather make the awful sacrifice of losing his grog than lose his beef. It is a painful reflection that our poorer classes are to be deprived of the strength-creating properties of beef. And yet we have an excellent substitute in American mutton, which will never be beyond the reach of the operative classes if we can confine American manufactories to American wool. Wool properly protected will pay for the rearing of the sheep. Wool protection will be the angel of mercy to our suffering poor, as it will give them mutton without money and without price. It is more important, then, for the operative classes to strike for wool protection than for more wages or fewer hours.

There is another kind of wool which has never yet got but a nominal foothold in this country. It is placed under the head of class No. 3, and designated as "carpet and other similar wools." This kind of wool has never been raised in this country, because manufacturers have made untiring and successful efforts to have our people believe that it could not be, and they have been successful in their efforts to so discriminate against it by congressional action that it could never be proven whether it could be or not. I believe there is a climate somewhere between the north line of Minnesota and the south line of Texas under which wool capable of supplying the place of every kind of wool used in the United States for any purpose can be successfully raised; and I believe that the United States, as a great landed proprietor, which for want of a market is so generously giving away its lands, should encourage the experiment. There is nothing now said in discouragement of this enterprise that was not once said in discouragement of raising merinos, so far as climate is concerned. We have waste lands as well as other Governments. We can raise shepherd dogs, ponies, and horses as cheaply as any other Government. We can also furnish children and disabled soldiers to ride our ponies and horses while herding them.

It might be an act of civilization as well as of public policy to encourage our Indians to raise these coarse wools, the trade in which is now monopolized by persons of no higher civilization than themselves in other countries. We certainly could better illustrate to the Indians the teachings of Christianity while acting in the capacity of shepherds; for no other calling is so honorably mentioned and so conspicuously brought forward in the New Testament. Upon them was conferred the honor of the first sight of the angel of the Lord revealing the good tidings of great joy that a Saviour was born. It was they who first went to Bethlehem. It was they who first saw the Babe in the manger. It was they who first glorified Him. How many appropriate hymns have we that we could teach these savages to sing, while acting in the capacity of shepherds, that would lead them almost imperceptibly to become interested in Scripture teachings. For instance:

"While shepherds watched their flocks by night,
All seated on the ground,
The angel of the Lord came down,
And glory shone around."

Now, there is no other class of men around which either mythology, fiction, or history has made any such glory shine; not even around the world's greatest statesmen, greatest inventors, or greatest conquerors.

And again:

"Shepherds, in the field abiding,
Watching o'er your flocks by night;
God with man is now residing;
Yonder shines the infant light."

And again:

"Shepherds, hail the wondrous stranger!
Now to Beth'lem speed your way."

We have now in this House a gentleman who was once a distinguished clergyman. His health requiring more activity, he has become one of the greatest shepherds in America. I have no doubt but that it was the beatification of that calling in the Scriptures and hymns that he read that turned his mind in that direction. All travelers in heathen countries tell us that shepherds are the most devout of idolaters. It is impossible for a man to be a shepherd and not realize that there is a Power somewhere that "tempers the wind to the shorn lamb."

I am for making the most energetic efforts to ascertain if these coarsest of wools cannot be raised somewhere in the country, and if it is not possible for the never-daunted genius of America to make a carpet exclusively of American products. If an officer of the General Government, or of any State, should purchase a carpet made in a foreign country our manufacturers would soon find it out and have him denounced, when the very carpet with which they would replace it would be composed largely, if not entirely, of foreign wool. A member of Congress could not wear in peace a woollen garment that was manufactured abroad. Yet I venture the assertion that half the woollen garments worn by the members of Congress are composed of foreign wool. Manufacturers say, "American carpets for America;" and I rejoin, "American wool for American carpets." If these manufacturers tell us that these coarse wools cannot be raised as cheaply in this country as foreign countries, I tell them that the same reasons that they urge in favor of protecting themselves against the degraded labor of the Old World apply with greater force to the growers of coarse wools, inasmuch as Government has so much land that needs occupation.

But I am opposed to these differences in classification, because all experience proves that where there are different duties upon different qualities of the same article the grossest frauds are perpetrated, and every one labors to bring his importations under the lowest class. Having uniform standard samples will remedy these frauds to some extent. But appraisers in custom-houses are often appointed because of their political services or because they are the poor relatives of an influential man as for their honesty and capacity. It is not every man who is honest who is a good judge of wool even by the sample. There are not a dozen members of this intelligent House who would not be wrong half the time in judging even by sample between some combing and some carpet wools. And yet the duty on one is twelve cents per pound and ten per cent. ad valorem, and on the other (which I contend can be profitably raised in this country) only three cents. It takes about four pages of our bill to bring about this discouragement of coarse wools in this country and this chance to evade the law, whereas only a few words are necessary. Four letters spell wool, and a few more spell out the uniform duty. All that then will be required of an appraiser will be to know what is wool. And every one knows what wool is, without distinction of race or color. But as the committee of wool-growers have agreed to this arrangement, I find the House generally assenting to it; but I cannot pass the subject by without giving it as my opinion that the committee of wool-growers rather acquiesced in it as the very best thing they could do rather than approved of it, and that the wool-growers will never consent that the manufacturers shall have the market of the world for any kind of wool unless they themselves can have the same market for woollen fabrics.

If this bill should pass at this session, it will be too late to do the poorer class of wool-growers any good this year, as they are not able to hold their clip. Much of it is already in the hands of speculators.

From wool I pass to another great agricultural interest that greatly needs protection. I mean that of flax, flaxseed, and the oils therefrom. Flax is the northern man's cotton. The late civil war caused many experiments as to its utility which developed the most cheering prospects. Flax is also the poor man's linen. If we owe an obligation to the colored man for replacing the white soldier who fell in the darkest hour of the late rebellion, are we not under an equal obligation to encourage the efforts of our citizens to bring to greater utility our only substitute for cotton? During the sessions of the Committee of Ways and Means we have had the most gratifying specimens of cotton and linen imitations; but, like all new developments of genius in industrial and agricultural pursuits, they were too expensive to cope with well-established and highly protected industries. Our Government ought not only to protect flax in all its relations, but it ought to make a liberal appropriation for experiments as to its utility. As we have an experimental garden here, I hope our Commissioner of Agriculture will devote as much of his attention as he can spare to the collection of flaxseed from all quarters of the globe and to experiments in the difference of the fiber and oils of the product of the different seeds.

The culture of flax has been retarded in this country by the prevalent idea that it is the most exhaustive of the soil of all crops. It is an old scarecrow that you cannot raise flax upon the same soil but once in seven years. Now, the wool crop has been called the most remunerative of all crops to the soil. The longer you feed your sheep upon a given quantity of land the richer it becomes. Hence this Government should insist that not one pound of wool should be brought into the United States from any quarter whatever unless under circumstances of an extraordinary character. For, although the sheep may be deficient in wool and deficient in carcass, she everywhere leaves the soil richer than she found it. She can restore what is better than gold to our exhausted mineral regions and carry vegetation to the peaks of our mountains. Now, strange as it may seem, agricultural experiments, backed by chemical analysis, prove that the flaxseed crop is more remunerative to the soil than the wool crop. What a wonderful advantage over its successful competitor in peace, the cotton crop. While France has exhausted legislation to save her sewerage, and chemistry to learn how to make up its deficient ammoniacal properties and to turn it to the best account, more crafty England, while profiting by French lessons and experience, makes herself the best patron of oil-cake in the world; and we, as false to agriculture as we were when we made the reciprocity treaty with Canada, have been allowing a drawback upon all oil-cake exported. We had better have allowed a drawback upon exported gold; for we can live without gold, but not upon an exhausted soil. Were it not that I might be charged with mistaking this House for an agricultural society, I should be pleased to give the results of my own experience upon this subject, and also to make a few extracts from the recent lectures of Professor Mechi, the great agricultural lecturer of England. If we are to leave a large debt to posterity, let us at least leave to it the soil as rich as we found it, so that they can dig out their annual taxes. This bill rightly abolishes the drawback. My assertion is this: that he who sells his flaxseed and takes home with him to feed out the product of that seed in oil-cake, and uses his manures judiciously, keeps his farm continually improving, and more so than if he kept sheep. Hence we should not only encourage the raising of flaxseed, but also the manufacture of oil from the seed. We want no foreign flaxseed competing with us. American seed alone should be ground at American mills and no oil-cake should be exported. Besides its usefulness it is ornamental. Thousands of dollars have been paid by American breeders in England for cattle when they had better at home; and the fact would have been apparent had they used oil-cake instead of corn for food. Oil-cake has not only all the fattening qualities of corn when used in the utmost profusion, but it gives a luster and velvet touch to the hair of animals which can only be attained by the most costly oils when fed upon corn. Corn is the girl in the kitchen, the animal in the shambles. Oil-cake is the same girl in the ball-room, the same animal upon the fair-grounds. Admitting that under the homestead law a man gets his land for nothing, this bill hardly affords the flax and flaxseed grower proportionate protection to other interests.

We first dig the holes for the posts with spades that are protected. Then come the cedar posts protected also. Then come the boards protected also. Then come the nails that are protected also, as well as the saw, the ax, and the hammer. We then go to work inside. The plows, the harrows, the planters, the cultivators, and the harvesters are all protected. And we pay our protection in advance. After running the risk of the drouth, floods, and frosts, we may get a crop to sell. We make no account of our liability to sickness. Transportation long and expensive is still against us. The agricultural interest asked for forty cents duty upon a bushel of seed, and forty cents upon a gallon of oil. The bill gives it thirty cents, which is a large increase upon former protection. Yet it is not proportionately large to some of the articles in the bill which are absolute necessities to farmers.

The same may be said of the duty upon cattle and all agricultural products. It is such an improvement as strongly inclines me to favor the bill, and I should do so if the excesses upon other articles could be curtailed to a protective revenue point. For the moment you make a tariff prohibitory upon articles manufactured by a few, and thereby destroy all foreign competition, home combinations at once raise the prices to oppressive rates, and the agricultural interest at once loses more than it has gained by its protection.

Several instances have occurred, at this session, where gentlemen have proposed to take the duties from all agricultural products on the ground that provisions ought to be cheap. I do not see how it would cheapen provisions to ruin all our farmers, as it certainly would if the farmers were to be taxed highly by duties to protect all their agricultural implements and other necessities and then they be compelled to compete on equal terms with Canadian and other farmers who have no war taxes to pay. If you want cheap food, lighten the taxes upon your farmers and thereby multiply them and encourage competition. Pennsylvania has taken a step in the right direction. She has taken the State taxes off from farms, the better to enable their owners to patronize her manufactories which are aggrandizing her State. The farmers are not a complaining class of people. The nature of their calling accustoms them to burdens of all kinds. But when they see the candies, sweetmeats, and champagne carried around, they know of no reason why they should be passed by. They know of no reason why the same protection extended to other vocations should be denied to them.

One of the advantages of this bill is that it provides for a Bureau of Statistics which every legislator, and especially upon the subject of the tariff, much needs. To show the want of such a bureau let us take the official statement of the exports and imports of the year just closed:

Exports.....	$466,646,132
Imports.....	409,411,513
	$57,234,629

Here is a balance in our favor of $57,000,000, when our official coin and bullion statement stands as follows:

Exports.....	$77,496,083
	$68,672,108

Now, all this surplus has not gone abroad for interest. Yet our official tables tell us that our exports have exceeded our imports. Making all allowances for our shameful foreign undervaluations and home fraudulent appraisements, we still know that the balance of trade has been largely against us. The discrepancy arises from the fact that our imports are reckoned in gold and exports in currency. But this discrepancy cannot be easily cast by outsiders, as gold has varied from 125 to 150 the past year, averaging 140. Yet we must know the price of gold the day the duties were paid. It is as probable that they were all paid when gold was lowest or highest as when at the average. The existing manufacturers in the West, although comparatively not very numerous, are unanimous and persistent in their entreaties for a change in the present tariff. Capitalists, all ready to lay the foundations for new establishments there, assure me that their work shall never commence without such a change.

Whilst I regret that I cannot support the bill in the shape in which it is likely to be presented, I should regard it as a calamity for this Congress to adjourn without a change. Should this bill be defeated, I shall strive to move a reconsideration, with every confidence that the bill can be so modified as to pass by a large majority. Should it be successful in this House, I shall rely upon the ability of the distinguished chairman of the Senate Finance Committee, the late Secretary of the Treasury, to so reform it that, while encouraging every struggling American industry, it will quiet the apprehensions of some of our wisest economists as to its deleterious effects on the finances of the Government.

Mr. MORRILL. Mr. Speaker, I am quite sensible that one of the grossest evils which characterizes American legislation, especially on the subject of the tariff, is instability. It is an evil so great and of such constant recurrence that I almost wonder that men can be found willing to embark their capital in commerce, trade, or manufactures. Beyond the ordinary vicissitudes which affect the business of the world, we have the vicissitudes of politics and the changes of whole delegations, even in the absence of any political change, in consequence of the system of rotation which prevails, and of which I do not complain, but mention as a fact. Although not much of a veteran myself, yet there is now no member in the House from New England who commenced service when I did, and but two other members from any part of the country who began and have been in continuous service for the same length of time. New members come from different stand-points and reach different conclusions. Amid something good in all this there is somewhat of evil. Our standing committees stand for one Congress only and then they are all made up anew.

When I came here last December I fondly anticipated that our first duty would be to lighten the burden of internal taxation. That duty has been laboriously and faithfully performed by both branches of Congress. I believe the law on that subject, as finally passed and as a whole, will be approved by the judgment of the country, and it may be hoped by another year that nothing in our political or financial condition will then exist which will prevent our going still further in the same direction. I did not, however, expect that we should be called upon to increase the tariff, except upon wool, and, as merely compensatory, upon wooleens. On the other hand, I even hoped for some reduction upon many articles of foreign growth or production. The action of Congress interdicting any measures for retiring our redundant paper money, except to a very limited amount, and the unexpectedly reluctant action of the Secretary of the Treasury in exercising even what power he has had to effect the same great object, changed the whole aspect of our financial affairs. Paper money became dominant, and it was at once apparent that it must to a large extent rule our financial affairs for several years to come. From necessity the business of the country and our tax and revenue laws must be gauged by that standard, fluctuating as it may be, and never for one moment at rest. To-day the wave sets in from the farthest West, and money in Wall street is abundant. Gold goes up. Tomorrow a demand from abroad or a demand to move the produce of the great basin drained by the Mississippi springs up and the wave retires. There is a stringency in Wall street, and gold goes down. That barometer, as its rising or sinking indications are flashed over the telegraphic wires, regulates the business transactions of the next hour at Eastport and St. Paul, at New Orleans and San Francisco. The cost of living is unreduced. The laborer abates nothing of his wages while paid in a currency that has an exchangeable value equal to only two thirds of its nominal value. Our people at once find themselves in competition with those whose industry is based on a gold standard, and the cry from one end of the land to the other immediately arises, "Save us or we sink!"

Intelligent men and men of the highest integrity from all parts of the country have been before the Committee of Ways and Means for the past six months, and their testimony shows that we cannot keep our people at work at their accustomed avocations without immediate and, what under ordinary circumstances would be considered, extraordinary measures.

The Committee of Ways and Means in reporting this bill, whatever gentlemen may think about it, have scarcely in any instance reported propositions bearing anything like the proportions which have been earnestly represented to them as no more than adequate to the occasion. Let me say that these demands for a higher tariff come less from New England than any other quarter. The bill will be more in aid of the "infantile branches of industry" in the middle States and the West, as the gentleman from Iowa [Mr. KASSON] calls them, than from those longer established and requiring less care. The bill also is not by a great deal so high in its rates as those proposed by the revenue commission. The judgment of this commission has received much and deserved credit throughout the country, and yet the Committee of Ways and Means deemed it unwise, if not imprudent, to accept of their recommendations as a whole as to the tariff, and have reported a bill far short of the rates advised, (more especially by the learned and distinguished gentleman, Mr. Colwell, who gave this subject the largest share of attention.)

The tariff bill presented to the Committee of Ways and Means by the revenue commission proposed one and a half cents per pound on bar-iron, but we only reported one and a quarter cents. On sheet-iron, where three cents was proposed, we offered two and a half cents. On chains less than one quarter inch in diameter, eight cents was proposed and but five was reported in the bill. On galvanized iron eight cents per pound was proposed, while in the bill the rate is only four and a half cents. On smiths' vises the commission proposed eight cents per pound, and the article in the bill was reported at four and a half cents. Common ten by fifteen window-glass was reported to us at two and three fourth cents per square foot, and we offered only two cents. Above thirty by forty inches square it was reported at seven cents per square foot, while we only placed it at four cents. So that it will be seen the carefully considered rates of the revenue commission were not only not accepted but very severely razeed by the Committee of Ways and Means. I do not cite these facts to prove that all the rates of duty in the bill are now right, but to show that the committee, or a part of them at least, were not inclined to adopt what may be considered extreme rates.

I shall not undertake to defend all the propositions found in this bill. Many of them did not receive my approval in the Committee of Ways and Means, and the action of the House has disappointed me. The tendency here has been rather to increase than diminish the rates proposed, but I shall not now turn my back upon the bill, as I believe something should be done at any rate, and passing the bill in this House will insure the usual and proper revision of it by the Senate and by its able Committee on Finance, just as surely as it would to recommit the bill to the Committee of Ways and Means, and will accomplish this object perhaps more speedily. Certainly Congress ought not and I believe will not adjourn until some tariff bill shall have been passed, even if it prolongs the session until September. I know there is a great clamor made against the bill from a quarter where we had a right to expect a calmer judgment. Those States where capital has not yet had time to accumulate; where less machinery is at work, and where the steam-engine does not yet do the work of hand labor, have most need of some increase of the tariff. The more abundant capital, the skilled labor, and the improved machinery of older and more densely populated States might get along, perhaps, with a tariff merely adjusted for revenue purposes. Much more than that produces a home competition quite as sharp as anything to be dreaded from abroad.

Ohio is rapidly becoming a great manufacturing State and now produces but little more breadstuff and butcher's meat than she requires for her own consumption. Illinois, that prodigy of growth among States, having a breadth and fertility of soil equal to the support of ten million of people, will very soon quit the business of exporting grain or even of cattle. Her coal mines foretell her destiny, and she will also soon cease to be merely what is called a grain-growing State. Her advantages of water communication, by lake and river, and her magnificent railway improvements, will enable her to leap at a bound into the front rank of manufacturing States. Wealth and population is all she now needs to this end, and these she is acquiring in the most rapid manner. Missouri and Iowa have equal natural advantages, possibly superior, and are certainly not without ambition for a friendly race on the same course. At present these and other States are dependent for a market for their agricultural products upon artisans employed outside of their own limits. Will it be wise for them to destroy that market and at the same time to postpone indefinitely the idea of building up a market at home? Do they wish to drive all parts of the country into the pursuit of agriculture alone? I have before said, and I repeat it, that within the lifetime of some of us who are now present these great western States are destined to assume the pre-eminence in manufactures. Cheap coal, cheap bread, and cheap meat all point in this direction. They have, therefore, a more direct and abiding interest in the tariff than any other portion of the Union. There should at least be no local or political jealousies on a financial question of this kind which is so interwoven with the future power and greatness of our country.

There is about the usual amount of hue and cry from free-trade quarters, from millionaires enriched by foreign trade, against the present tariff bill. Hired hack-writers are particularly active in defaming the measure. New York city appears to be the center from whence most of these denunciations emanate. It is also the prolific mother of free-trade pamphleteers. I am proud of that great city which takes such an active and controlling part in the commerce of the world. But even there foreign commerce is not all that should engage the mind or heart of the statesman. That city is the seat of a great diversity of manufactures and of the mechanic arts. The amount of their productions in the aggregate is immense, and the number engaged therein, though not the ruling class in political economy, must be far greater than all who are engaged in or dependent upon foreign commerce. Crippled by many circumstances during the war, I would gladly do anything to restore our ship-owners to their former prestige, but they ought not to require legislation for their exclusive benefit and to the detriment of the whole country. Let all parts of the country prosper, but if one part of the country only can grow at one and the same time, shall we not prefer a new State in the West with a half million of people to the addition of that number to a city already so swollen in numbers that it sometimes threatens to withdraw that fealty which is due to its own State?

I cannot forget that an equal hue and cry and even greater amount of ridicule came forth at the time of the passage of the tariff of 1861. That tariff has since been largely increased, and yet its present rates have fully vindicated the measure, and those who first stigmatized it as a prohibitive monstrosity now admit its general propriety and maintain that it is exactly what is needed as a revenue tariff. Nothing that we do now can be but for temporary purposes. If we had been able to reduce our currency no action on the tariff would have been necessary. It may be useless to argue the abstraction whether gold has risen in value or whether paper has fallen. The fact stares us in the face that it takes a very large sum of our paper money to buy a small amount of property. Our currency measured by gold is only as three to two, and the value of gold itself, the standard, by its unprecedented increase for the past fifteen years throughout the world has beyond any doubt largely diminished.

The fair question is, whether we shall ignore these facts or whether we shall not on the other hand do something to take care of the various industries of the country for the time being or until we have funded our national indebtedness and retired the excess of legal-tender notes? It is a question whether or not the laborer shall be compelled to reduce his wages before the value of our present currency is increased. If the products of his labor have got to be sold for less it is plain he must work for less. Capital will seek and prefer idleness to loss. It will not employ labor and get nothing in return. It is therefore a question which mainly concerns labor, capital always being better able to take care of itself.

Let us look at the extravagancies proclaimed as to the rates proposed on iron. I am free to say that a moderate increase of the present duties upon iron and a maintenance of the existing classification might have been the wisest and most prudent course to adopt, but others, to whose opinions and votes I could not but defer, thought differently, and I trust they will stand by their opinions now in the hour of trial. The new classification, by placing lower grades among the higher, increases the rates of duty quite as much as any nominal addition thereto; and by singling out the various descriptions of iron manufactures for specific duties, in a temporary measure, where such articles only were to be touched as would afford some prospect of additional revenue, or such as were in imminent peril of extinction from foreign competition, I foresaw would arouse a jealousy difficult to appease, and also that no symmetry could be preserved in the bill. Having gone so far in that direction we could not refuse equal claims presented in other quarters, and yet we had not the time for a complete revision of the whole subject.

But look at the present price of bar-iron in our markets and see whether after all the bill is really so very objectionable. It will be found quoted at $115 to $125 in currency per ton, and we have raised the duty five dollars or from twenty dollars up to twenty-five dollars in gold per ton of two thousand pounds. Upon cut nails we proposed two cents a pound. The present price is seven cents, and it would not be less if the duty was put at one and a half cent. Common sheet-iron is worth from six to eight cents per pound, and the duty proposed is from two and a quarter to two and three quarters per pound. Russia or polished sheet-iron is worth twenty-seven to twenty-eight cents per pound in currency, and the duty proposed is four cents per pound in coin. These duties are high enough, but they are not so high as to frighten grave legislators from their propriety.

Let us look at some other features of the bill. Take ten by fifteen common window-glass. The price is $7 75 per one hundred feet, and the duty will amount to $2 25. Pig lead sells for eleven cents per pound, and the duty proposed is three cents per pound. Copper is now worth about thirty-two cents per pound, and the duty proposed is five cents. In consequence of the duty upon cotton some compensatory changes have been made upon a few articles, but the main bulk of cotton goods remain as heretofore. The duties upon lumber at the termination of the reciprocity treaty were in much need of revision. These in the main as they stand in the bill are now believed to be satisfactory, though if the bill had been accepted on this subject just as it was reported, I am inclined to think all parts of the country would have been better suited.

On the subject of wool and woolsen a tariff with increased rates seems to have been expected by the whole country. The question had been largely agitated, and after long consideration had been placed before Congress in due form as agreed upon by the parties interested. It is true the duties are high, but so fair were they deemed that this part of the bill has encountered little or no opposition in the House. Can it be that the enemies to higher duties on wool have laid in ambush with the purpose of defeating in the end the whole bill? I cannot believe it. This sort of tactics in the end cannot prevail. The interest is too large and much too worthy to be sacrificed in this way. Gentlemen may find that it is not so safe now as it may have been in the days of John Randolph to "go a mile out of the way to kick a sheep." The wool-growers are a power throughout the land, and legislators will find they cannot be treated with contempt.

The rates upon flax and linen goods have been increased, first to obtain additional revenue and to increase if possible the home demand for flax, as the culture of that article for the seed alone is surely much less profitable to the farm and the farmer than it would be if cultivated for the fiber. The increased rates upon crockery-ware will give increased revenue, and besides that, having the best raw materials for its manufacture, found all the way from New Jersey to Missouri, we ought not to be so largely dependent on Europe that we cannot sit down to an ordinary dinner without calling in the resources of France, Germany, and Great Britain for the common utensils of the table. I have no doubt the House will fix the duty upon railroad iron satisfactorily. We have no time now to present a new bill if this should be rejected. There is no doubt the Senate will speedily remove whatever may cause some of our friends to hesitate about voting for the bill, and with some little pruning I have just as little doubt, while our currency remains in anything like its present magnificent proportions, it will yield as much or more revenue as will our existing law.

In regard to those articles for which the British Provinces seek our markets, it has appeared to me, while their admission free of duty was wholly incompatible with our interests, that a moderate system of duties would prove the wisest economy. If the rates were kept within proper bounds no considerable part of the revenue collected would be paid by our own people, but it would fall entirely on the other side. If raised too high we should compel them to find other markets, which cannot be done without a severe struggle and great loss. Besides this, by high duties we shall drive the Provinces to make a market at home to consume their own products by setting up enterprises which do not exist now for the production of articles which they now obtain of us, or we shall compel them to go where exchanges can be made on better terms. The rates in the original bill seemed to me as too severe, and these have been in some instances largely increased, but I hope the House, on reflection, will not adhere to the extreme positions taken. Let us not have on our statutes anything with the appearance of passion. We can maintain our just rights firmly without spite. The time will undoubtedly come when these Provinces will find shelter under the stars and stripes. We are in no hurry. Meantime they buy corn and pork of us. They buy nearly as much coal of us as we do of them. Is it, then, sound policy for us to fix such rates as would, if adopted by them, shut these articles out of their markets? I submit the question to the decision of the House. We can afford to be just, but we cannot afford belligerent legislation without adequate provocation.

I have some doubt whether we can afford to reduce the duties upon tea and coffee until after our floating debt shall have been permanently funded. I know it is the practice of England to obtain a large revenue from these articles which distributes the tax without much regard to persons. The aristocracy of birth and wealth govern there and our policy should be different. Except in great exigencies, such as now exist, these articles, as well as sugar, should be free or nearly so. Let the tax fall heavily upon articles of luxury or such as minister to vicious tastes and habits, but lightly on the prime necessities of life. Property, not persons, should here bear the heaviest part of taxation. For another year, however, I think the present tax should be retained.

The information received by the Committee of Ways and Means from the many delegations before us impressed the committee with the opinion that aid must be given in the tariff, or our factories, shops, and forges must cease their operations, leaving us to look for most of our supplies of goods from foreign importation; as well as leaving us dependent for whatever revenue the Treasury is to obtain entirely upon the duties on the importation of foreign goods and merchandise. Whether this break would occur in the absence of the proposed legislation, or if it should occur how long it would continue, others must judge. It does not seem possible to place the business of the country upon a proper footing until we return to specie payments. No duties that we impose, until that time, will be likely to prove prohibitory. Then a tariff sufficient to obtain the amount of revenue we shall require, and one which shall not actually discriminate against American industry, will be satisfactory to all parts of the country.

The foreign articles from which we derive the most of our revenue are either articles of luxury required to satisfy the taste or the pride of those both able and willing to pay for them, or they are such as can be and ought to be produced or made by our own people. Taxation upon these articles is certainly greatly to be preferred to any kind of internal taxation. But the importing merchant steadily prefers to sell all sorts of foreign rather than American merchandise, and labors to persuade the people that it is for their interest to buy where they can buy cheapest, forgetting that the American purchaser has an equal interest in the prices of the commodities he has to sell as in those which he buys, and that unless he can sell his own products at remunerative prices he cannot buy at all. Ask the merchant why he prefers to sell foreign goods and his ready answer is that he can realize more profits upon such sales than upon the sale of American goods. Their actual cost is always a myth; the styles cannot instantly be reproduced and duplicated; when made to order or otherwise a monopoly is more easily obtained; but American goods have no secrets; only fair and regular profits can be charged; and Miss Flora McFlimsey will not wear goods made at Manchester, New Hampshire, lest she finds the same pattern on Bridget the next week, and she will not place on the floor of her sumptuous drawing-room a Lowell carpet lest she might recognize in her summer rambles among her country cousins the same figure in a room only fourteen feet square. Princely fortunes are made upon capital embarked in a foreign trade. Its sympathies are all for its perpetuation, and it is blind to the fact that an increase of American productions would enable our people to consume even larger quantities of those brought from abroad.

Woolen and cotton manufacturers have had various fortunes in our country, and if they have made any large and exceptional dividends for the past few years it may be accounted for mainly from the fact that they are compelled to hold stocks both of raw materials and of goods on hand, which usually amount to as much as their entire capital. A small rise on such stocks makes a large figure in dividends. But these parties, sooner or later, have got to return to a specie standard, and it is difficult to see how they are to do this without being subjected to a reversal of the process by which profits have heretofore been made when gold advanced in price. Few prudent men, at any rate, would now esteem it a good time to buy or hold manufacturing stocks. Some of these dividends are made on shares of capital stock now rated at $100, which originally cost $1,000 each; and some of these companies of no more than a million of capital have paid the Government the past year over $400,000 in taxes. A careful examination made by competent parties, I am informed, shows that taking the entire capital invested in woolen manufactures since 1825 the whole has not yielded over two per cent. per annum; many of the companies making heavy losses, others making no dividends for years, while a few have done remarkably well. But the importers and holders of large stocks of foreign goods within the past five years have made heavy gains quite as often as any other class of men in the country. It is all well enough for them, but any such luck on the part of manufacturers seems to be a crime.

My State is almost purely an agricultural State, and I care nothing for manufacturers only as I regard them as a great public benefit to the nation and to the places where they are located; and I wish there were, as there ought to be, one hundred thousand more of them to-day employed in Vermont. That is the only way we can hope for any considerable improvement in our future prosperity, and it is the shortest way for any great and solid improvement in many of our western States. With this a steady growth in wealth and population may be justly anticipated, and we can welcome all the immigrants that may arrive on our shores without fear of crowding any of the pursuits of life, but all the time preserving that equilibrium which should exist among all those engaged in agriculture, commerce, manufactures, and the mechanic arts.

Congress has now been in session more than seven months. After labors the most incessant and after the disposal of questions of unprecedented gravity we find ourselves exhausted and anxious to return to our respective homes. We must not be too eager to rush to the approaching field of autumn politics. One subject more demands our consideration. Its difficulties, though great, are far from being insurmountable. Our broad country has many and varied interests, increasing in importance year by year, and we, as the representatives of the nation, are bound to look over the whole field and unfold them within our guardianship. A generous feeling, to be just to all parts of the Union, doubtless animates every breast. The palpitating interests of every section of our country command equal regard. Congress regulates commerce. Whatever their wants may be the States can do nothing. Over four hundred millions, and reckoned in our currency over six hundred millions, of foreign goods were last year purchased by our people. This immense trade absorbs the means sorely needed to fund our national debt, now rapidly falling due, and threatens to paralyze the chief sources of our internal revenue. Let us, then, shirk no real duty and be frightened at no unreal obstacles. We cannot each one of us hope to triumph at all points in any tariff bill—much of the business of life is a compromise—but let us adhere to our work, like the gallant chieftain, Grant, "if it takes all summer," until we have brought out something which will satisfy the just expectations of the people; and then, congratulating ourselves upon harmonious action at last, we shall joyfully quit these heated Halls and depart, sure of a welcome home.

Mr. DELANO next addressed the House. [His remarks will be found in the Appendix.]

Mr. MORRILL. I desire to give notice that I shall endeavor to reach a vote on this question at half past three o'clock.

Mr. HOOPEK, of Massachusetts. It is not necessary, Mr. Speaker, for me to say that I am in favor of the policy of protecting domestic manufactures and of encouraging in every way the development of all the great productive resources of our country. Agriculture is the true foundation of national wealth and prosperity. That foundation is insignificant or grand according to the superstructure upon it. Agriculture cannot flourish by itself; it must be aided by diversity of employment among the people, in order that those engaged in other pursuits may create a market that will furnish a ready sale for the products of agriculture. It is not alone the supply of food to the workmen employed in manufacturing and mining and commerce that creates such a market. The development of mechanical skill that converts into articles of value the great staples of agricultural production, like wool, cotton, flax, hemp, and various other products, is of far greater importance. Many articles are thrown away as useless until manufacturing skill imparts value to them. The cultivation of those great staples would yield no profit but for the mechanical skill and industry developed by manufacturing. Their bulk renders the transportation of most of such products to distant foreign markets so expensive as often to consume the whole of their value, leaving no profit to the producer.

This country possesses advantages over every other in the world, in its diversity of climate, in its mineral wealth, and in its abundance of fertile lands that require only labor to make them productive. But of what use is it to extend the cultivation of those fertile lands if there are none to consume the products? A few acres supply food to the cultivator; and there is no incentive to industry and energy unless there is a market for his products. The farmers of the West have in many instances within a few years consumed their corn for fuel, because there was no cheap mode of transportation to supply it to miners, who gladly would have furnished coal in exchange for that corn. How much more must this be the case when the farmer depends on a foreign demand for a market, subjecting his products to the cost of thousands of miles of transportation. The opponents of protection to home industry say we should be content to find markets abroad for our agricultural products and depend on the foreign manufacturer to supply what we need; by which means the value of everything the farmer raises is diminished by the high charges for transportation by land and by sea, and the cost is enhanced of all he receives in return for his products, instead of placing the farmer, the miner, and the manufacturer side by side, where each can aid and supply the wants of the other, and thereby save the immense cost of transportation hither and thither across the ocean.

My theory of protection to American industry does not differ materially from the practice of the English theory of "free trade," as applied to the interest of British industry and commerce; which is to encourage free trade in all raw materials for manufacture which cannot be produced in Great Britain, and in all articles which Great Britain can produce cheaper than any other country. This British idea of free trade is identical with my idea of what the protection policy of this country should be as applied to the interest of American industry and commerce, namely, to encourage free trade in all the materials for manufacture which we cannot produce, or which we can produce cheaper than any other country, and to impose duties for the protection of American labor against the competition of the cheaper labor of foreign countries on all articles which we can produce, and for revenue alone on those other articles which we cannot produce.

The tendency of a purely agricultural community is aristocratic; the large landed proprietor and the laborers who till the soil composing mainly such a community. In Europe, where ever this condition of society exists, the laborers constitute what is termed "the peasantry." In the only portions of our own country where purely agricultural communities were preferred, that labor has been performed by slaves. Field labor under the supervision of the proprietor of the land, or his agents, requires but little skill or intelligence. In such communities skilled labor is not appreciated, and education and the improvement of the laboring class are discouraged as useless and tending to create discontent and insubordination. In a community where agriculture is combined with manufacturing, mining, and mechanical pursuits, intelligent skilled labor is absolutely essential, and to that end the education and improvement of all classes of the people are demanded for the public interest. For this reason in a community where the protection of industry encourages diversity of occupation, combining agricultural with manufacturing and mechanical employments, there will be found school-houses, churches, and lyceums, in every city, town, and village, and it will be rare to find a native-born citizen who cannot read and write and converse intelligently on almost any topic of general concern. The effect of a free-trade theory, favoring a purely agricultural community dependent on foreign commerce for its supplies of manufactures, may have been seen in the condition of most of the slave States, in which the community generally consisted of some large landed proprietors, some poor whites, and a great many slaves, and where it was said to be exceptional to find a laboring man, black or white, who could read and write.

I confess that I am proud of the condition of New England, considered in this aspect; and I am so well satisfied with my own State, which enjoys the reputation of taking the lead in all the great moral and intellectual reforms to raise the standard of intelligence and culture, that I am never offended by any of the sneers or denunciations of Massachusetts, by rebels and rebel sympathizers, and which are sometimes even heard on the floor of this House.

In regard to this tariff bill, I am not aware that New England has asked for anything in it; the changes it proposes do not generally favor her interests. The manufacturers of New England have been for several years supplied with coal, free of duty, from the neighboring British Provinces. This tariff bill imposes upon it a duty of $1 50 per ton, which is equal to five dollars per ton on every ton of iron produced in New England—more than three tons of coal being consumed in the manufacture of a ton of rolled or cast iron. The gentleman from Philadelphia [Mr. KELLEY] says, however, that this will benefit New England manufacturers; but they cannot see it in that light. I shall ask for a special vote on it in the House, with the hope that the amendment made in the Committee of the Whole House will be rejected, and thereby restore the section taxing coal as it was reported from the Committee of Ways and Means with the approval of the distinguished Representative from the Pittsburgh district of Pennsylvania, [Mr. MOORHEAD.]

The duty on salt has been increased seventy-five per cent., making the whole duty equal to about three hundred and fifty per cent. on the foreign cost. This article is largely used in New England for preserving and packing fish. Our fishermen and packers cannot understand how they are to be benefited by this increase of duty, though the gentleman from Philadelphia says they will be benefited. The crushers of linseed along the eastern coast are simply "crushed out" by this tariff; and we must hereafter import the oil, as it will be a long time before the West can supply the requisite quantity to meet the consumption of the whole country. I think our distinguished chairman of Ways and Means will be unwilling to have this bill, if it becomes a law, known as the "Morrill tariff." It would be more justly designated as the "Pennsylvania and western tariff."

I shall vote for this bill, however, because other portions of the country than New England say that it is necessary for their protection, and because I believe in the theory of protecting the labor and of encouraging the development of the great material resources of this country. But I am opposed to such high rates of duty as this tariff imposes, except as a temporary measure to meet the exigencies of the present time, growing out of the expansive condition of the currency and the scarcity of labor, which are inevitable results of the war in which the nation has been engaged. I believe that when the injurious effects of the war have passed away, and our currency, which measures the value of property, is restored to the standard of coin, lower rates and a permanent scale of duties will better protect the substantial interests of industry and promote the prosperity of the whole country.

Mr. KASSON. Mr. Speaker, I observe this morning in the House some signs which the friends of this bill evidently regard as signs of demoralization of those gentlemen who yesterday seemed confident of success in defeating the principal features of this bill. I trust that when we come to a vote upon several of the great questions involved in the bill it will be found not only that the West is neither demoralized on the one hand nor correctly represented in its interests on the other by the distinguished gentleman from Ohio, [Mr. DELANO,] and also that New England is not converted by the gentleman from Ohio to entertain the theory that he has put forward this morning.

So far as I can remember the substance of the remarks of the gentleman from Ohio, they rested mainly upon the necessity of protecting the wool-growing interest of this country. To that subject I desire the attention of the House for a few moments. The wool that is imported from foreign countries at the lower rates of which they speak, now comes mainly from Australia and the ports of Brazil. It is produced chiefly there because land is cheap, grass is abundant, the winters are mild, and the sheep are healthy. The attempts of the wool-growing interest in this country east of the Mississippi valley to secure prosperity to itself and a rich return for the culture of wool will prove vain unless you can upset the arrangements of divine Providence in this country. The far West possesses all the conditions of cheap production. It is hardly five years since sheep were introduced in any quantity into the State of Iowa. We have increased the number from hundreds of thousands to about two millions in that State. No protection which you of the East can get will enable you to permanently devote yourselves to this interest, and you must turn your attention to some other investment. Why, sir, when you get sheep on the western plains, especially in the buffalo range and on the Arkansas and neighboring streams, where the grass is sweet and nutritious and where animals range the entire winter, you will find sheep produced there so easily and so cheaply that you cannot compete with the vast future production of wool on the plains of the West.

In the East, where your land is worth twenty dollars and thirty dollars per acre, where for nearly six months in the year you feed your sheep upon the grass that has been cut and dried at great expense, where hay is costly; I say that where these things exist you cannot compete with the production of the West, where the winters are short, and where we need but a small amount of forage for the winter. The attempt is vain to do it. Therefore I say it is necessary to adjust tariffs upon other principles than by the attempt to confer bounties upon a particular branch of industry to secure the development of that branch in a particular part of the country. Whatever gentlemen may say to the contrary, I say that to-day the raising of wool in Iowa is one of the most lucrative branches of business to which farmers can direct their attention, and it will be still more lucrative as you go further West, where still cheaper elements of production will be found.

Now, let me say that my objection to this tariff bill consists mainly in this, that it rests upon no fixed principle in itself, and upon no fixed policy that hangs upon a correct principle of adjustment. Just so certain as you yield to this interest and that interest and the other interest the particular protection which it demands, just so certain do you run from the one branch to another in order to equalize what you have given to one by giving more to another, to compensate for whatever injury may possibly be done to it.

Mr. WOODBRIDGE. Will the gentleman yield to me for a moment?

Mr. KASSON. I would rather yield when I have got through my argument. But if the gentleman desires it, I will yield now.

Mr. WOODBRIDGE. I merely wish to say to the gentleman from Iowa [Mr. KASSON] that we Puritans of New England do not war against the laws of Providence. And if fifty years hence we find we cannot raise wool there, we will raise something else, for we can do it. But we ask the gentlemen of the West to come forward and help us now, and also help the West, and God will take care of the future.

Mr. KASSON. If I understand the gentleman from Vermont [Mr. WOODBRIDGE] correctly, in his opinion as well as mine the title of this bill should be changed so as to read, "A bill to prevent the diffused blessings of divine Providence from being enjoyed by the people of the United States." It is an attempt against the laws of Providence to force the people of this country to pay more for what they need than the laws of Providence would otherwise require. As I was going on to say, this system of protecting one of the articles that you raise the cost of by this bill, compels you to go immediately to another interest and raise the price of that. Take the article of wool, for instance: no sooner do you propose to increase the tariff on wool than you immediately go to the manufacturers of wool and give them an increased protection on their manufactures. And thus those who raise the wool pay back a large part of the bounty that is paid for the raising of wool to contribute to the bounty given to the manufacturer, and the non-producer of wool pays both bounties in buying his clothing. And so it is in relation to the article of iron, or upon any other particular branch upon which you increase your tariff, you immediately go off in another direction and increase the tariff upon other collateral interests affected by it; and so you build up a gigantic system of bounties upon all these interests upon the plea of protecting them.

The fundamental error in this bill is this: you endeavor to make the people of this country grow rich off each other. I remember that upon a former occasion I illustrated my argument in this way: one man in a village was buying lots of another, and the other was buying lots of him. They were buying and selling with each other. As one of them remarked, "We are trying to grow rich off each other." And thus it is in this system of protection by high bounties. You are aiming to make the people of this country grow rich, not by selling to foreign people and making their profits from abroad, for that you could do by a correct tariff; but here you are attempting to make one class of people in this country grow rich by the burdens you impose upon another class of people. I will agree to any tariff which will enable you to sell abroad in foreign countries and make your profits off foreign people. But you now ask me to vote for a bill which is going to build up one portion of the people of this country by the impoverishment of another portion. Develop your industry in such a shape and arrange your tariff in such a manner that you can sell your goods to foreign countries, and you not only aid to make the manufacturers of the United States rich off the people of foreign countries, but you also benefit the people of this country by reducing the cost of what you manufacture to the consumers of this country.

Now, sir, to illustrate. Instead of granting your bounties everywhere upon the manufacture of certain articles in this country, admit on your free list most of those articles which are at the base of our manufactures. Diminish the cost of the manufactures of this country, and then you accomplish two purposes: you sell more cheaply, and at the same time without loss of profit to yourselves. You sell more cheaply to the people of this country; and you begin to prepare yourselves for shipping abroad and underselling foreign manufacturers in their markets. But when you pile your tariff duties upon the raw materials, and then of necessity pile them upon the manufactured articles, and then of necessity pile them upon other dependent interests in this country to enable them to raise the means to buy your manufactures at the increased prices, you are doing nothing under heaven but endeavoring to make one portion of the people of this country rich at the expense of another, and then turning round and endeavoring to enrich the latter by taking away from the former. The result will be the same as if you should attempt, with a capital in one interest of $50,000,000 and the same amount of capital in another interest, to take the profits that one makes and give them to the other, in order to restore the equilibrium. What you call protection, therefore, is simply a system of borrowing from one to pay to another. To this system of tariff I object; and I understand the people of the West to object to it, because those who produce nothing in the way of manufactures are obliged to foot all the bills of these accumulated bounties granted by this tariff bill to special interests.

Now, sir, take the article of railroad iron. There are some scores of millions of dollars, it is claimed, invested in the production of railroad iron in this country. To protect that interest you increase the tariff upon railroad iron. Now, in the ten States and Territories of the West there are $500,000,000 of capital invested in railroads. The increased profits realized by the makers of railroad iron fall at once as an increased burden upon that interest of $500,000,000—an interest important to all the great interests of the West. The burden is at once felt by the people in the matter of increased freights resulting from the increased cost of the railroads. That which bears us down in the West is, as I stated yesterday, the terrific cost of getting our products to market. You propose to increase this cost. You tell the farmers of the West that they are to get their compensation by building up cities in the East to buy their breadstuffs, yet you embarrass the construction of proper lines of communication; the very means by which we are to get our breadstuffs to those cities. What you call protection amounts, therefore, simply to a system of equal robbery; taking from one home interest to pay to another. When you have done this you say that you have framed an equal tariff law, and that its equal protection is diffused over all the different interests. I say that this is illogical; it is absurd. You must change your theory of a tariff or else you must perpetually fail in your effort to gain a system that shall actually make the United States rich. If that is your object you must diminish the cost of the production of your manufactures; and when you have done that you have taken a great step toward protecting both the manufacturers and the people of the United States. But if we go on in the present plan of adding to the cost of everything we produce, there is not another country on the face of the globe that will contribute one cent to enrich the people of the United States or be able to buy a single article of our production.

Now, sir, when the claim is made here, as it is so frequently, that these interests in Pennsylvania and elsewhere are in danger of ruin, I appeal to the evidence of my own eyes, and I deny it. Upon every line of railroad over which business or duty calls me, I see improvements everywhere going on for the development of manufactures. You cannot go from here to Baltimore, from Baltimore to Philadelphia, from Philadelphia to the West; you cannot go to New England, you cannot go anywhere that you will not see new manufacturing establishments going up; and if any are going to ruin themselves it is in this way. If this is ruin then we had better let them go on in the direction of this action; for I never saw, and I do not believe in any part of the world to-day there is such wide-spread success and general prosperity as in the northern States of the Union. But you will point me to this establishment and to that, and tell me that it has been obliged to stop. I admit that. I know there are foolish investments made in all States of the Union. If a capital of $300,000 be put in the erection of a mill where it ought not to be put, and you there attempt to compete with mills on the line of railroads, near coal, iron, water, and raw materials, your mill must be by comparison a failure. You should not protect bad investments by making the balance of the country pay for them. That is the only species of suffering I have seen or heard of in any part of the manufacturing region—the result of misplaced, or mismanaged, or extravagant investments.

But suppose you do not make as much this year as last; it is so with farmers. I know one spring we sell corn at a dollar and the next spring at fifty cents, and then again we burn it as cheap fuel. Do we go about moping and complaining to the American Congress asking for bounty to stop our losses? No, we stand to the laws of Providence and the changes of trade. We know that in the current of years no other country in the world can compete with us of the West in the production of all the necessities of life. Sir, this protection to these special interests is all wrong. You are demanding for these interests what you never think of giving to the agriculture of the West. When you put your tariff upon farm products and on cattle what do we care for that? There is no country upon the American continent, except possibly Mexico—no, not even Mexico, for Texas can furnish them as cheaply as Mexico—can compete with us in the production of beef and pork. But then you strike at us on packing the articles by putting an enormous tariff upon salt. If there be one necessary thing to human existence it is salt. Yet that interest comes here and asks increase of protection so that we cannot pack or use our beef and pork except at this enormous increase of expense. It is rather hard, for in Iowa and many other parts of the West we are not near salt-works. But I say to these salt gentlemen that when our railroad gets to the Salt Lake they will require at least five times the bounty they ask in this bill to keep their salt-works going, for there you have nothing to do but to rake it up and grind it. There, again, you are undertaking a war against divine Providence.

Sir, we must abandon this peculiar conception of a protective tariff, and for that reason I want the bill sent back to the Committee of Ways and Means in order that it may be fundamentally changed. We must have freer admission into the country of certain bases of manufacture, which are indispensable and must be free to make our manufactures successful. I want to press this upon the attention of the House. For then you not only help the manufacturer, but you diminish the cost to the consumers on the one hand, and on the other you enable the manufacturer to compete with those who sell the same article abroad, and induce him to draw his wealth from foreign countries, in part, instead of seizing it by force of law exclusively from our own people.

Mr. GRISWOLD. Will the gentleman tell me what branch of our manufactures, except of coarse cottons, can stand the free admission of foreign goods to compete with it? And I would ask further whether his ideas of free trade are not derived from these free-trade tracts published by the Free-Trade League of which he is a member?

Mr. KASSON. I will answer, Mr. Speaker, that that gentleman is much better informed as to the purposes, objects, by-laws, and organization of the Free-Trade League than I am. I know nothing whatever of its purposes, except the general purpose which has been maintained by some of the best statesmen in this country, that a tariff should be created for revenue with incidental protection to the industry of this country. I think that is right, and if it is not the principle of the gentleman from New York I think he is entirely wrong.

Mr. GRISWOLD. Do I understand the gentleman to say that he was not aware that he was one of the officers of the Free-Trade League?

Mr. KASSON. No, sir. I understand that I have the distinguished honor of being a "councilor" elect to it, and I am now giving my counsel to it and to all the people of the country, and I hope they and my friend will take the counsel I offer.

Mr. WOODBRIDGE. I congratulate the Free-Trade League on having so able a counsel. Now I ask him whether he approves of this paper that is on my desk entitled "An Address from the Free-Trade Association of London to the American Free-Trade League of New York."

Mr. KASSON. I shall have to give time to the gentleman to read it, for I have never read it myself. Those gentlemen who are so well informed I hope will be duly impressed by whatever information they have. As for myself, I speak from an American point of view. They may speak from a British point of view.

Mr. DAVIS. The gentleman has stated that in his travels in this country he has found evidences of new manufactories springing up in every direction. I want to know in what part of the country he has found the people so fortunate now as to be able to embark in new, untried manufacturing enterprises.

Mr. KASSON. I do not think the gentleman can go into the city of Baltimore without seeing three large new establishments, before he enters the city, going up. And there are many establishments in Connecticut which, from information that I have received of a perfectly reliable character, have made from fifty to one hundred and fifty per cent. on the investment during the last year.

Mr. DAVIS. The gentleman is stating upon information and belief. I will say to him that to-day in the city of Syracuse three large establishments engaged in the manufacture of iron have closed their doors, and that one third of all the salt blocks are unoccupied and not running.

Mr. KASSON. I can point my friend from New York to some fifteen or twenty mercantile and banking concerns and numerous other business concerns that have gone down. There is not any branch of industry very probably that has not suffered in some of its members. I can point to farmers almost ruined by embarrassment, who can hardly get enough to take what they have to market and realize clothing and shelter under your high protective system.

And now what does this bill do? It raises the tariff on lumber, which is so necessary to the western prairie farmer; on nails, without which he cannot drive his boards on his house or build his fence; and on salt, without which he cannot preserve his beef and pork. There is hardly a thing we consume which this bill forgets to raise the duty upon. Every prominent necessity of life, food, fuel, shelter, and clothing, is embraced and made more expensive to the consumer throughout the country. Even on boys' pocket knives the duty is increased about three times—six hundred per cent. one member of the committee tells me. And yet it is said this is a tariff for mere protection. Why, sir, you are protecting the American people until they will not be able to buy one solitary thing that is protected if this system is to go on.

Mr. DAWES. I understand the gentleman from Iowa to base his hostility to this bill upon the fact that it is in the interest of eastern manufacturers and against the interests of the West.

Mr. KASSON. No, sir; I think if the gentleman's ears were as open as they usually are he would understand very well that my objection to it is that it is an attempt to legislate for special interests, and then to balance the good done to one by the injury done to another.

I give New England credit as not being responsible for this bill. New England is necessarily moderate in her tariff views if she is loyal to all her great interests. She builds ships and sends seamen afloat on the ocean; she carries our commerce across the great waters. She has no right to a prohibitory tariff or to be an advocate of one. She would sacrifice the interests of half her people for the benefit of the other half if she was. I say, therefore, that New England ought not to support this bill.

Mr. DAWES. In whose interest is this bill?

Mr. KASSON. In the interest of every manufacturer whose interest is protected by increasing the bounties on manufactures to be paid by the people who consume them, whether they be in the East or in the West. The manufacturing concerns have got from twenty to six hundred per cent. added to the tariff on various manufactures. Now, sir, under these circumstances I ask if any gentleman who seeks to protect to some extent the consumers of this country, who constitute the great mass of the people, can possibly support this bill.

Sir, I know very well that the iron interest, the cotton interest, the glass interest, and many others, can send gentlemen here to advocate their interests, and that they may be heard before the committee and may fill our lobbies; but the great interest of the consumers of the country is not organized into a system of mutual protective associations. That interest must be heard by members on this floor who seek to protect it. It must be heard here as much as these organizations of capital. Consumption represents millions; capital only thousands.

I repeat, in conclusion, that my objection to this bill rests upon the ground that it goes upon a false theory, that it enables one portion of the people of the country to derive all the benefit of its enactment into law at the expense of the other portion, and opens no opportunity for the manufacturers of this country to undersell any foreign country in the markets of the world.

Mr. GARFIELD obtained the floor.

Mr. WILSON, of Iowa. I ask the gentleman from Ohio to yield me ten minutes.

Mr. GARFIELD. I yield to the gentleman.

Mr. WILSON, of Iowa. I rise more for the purpose of explaining the motion which I intend to submit to the House than for the purpose of submitting any remarks upon the bill, though I cannot permit this occasion to pass without noticing the peculiar position in which I find this measure standing before the House. New England has nothing to do with it and does not desire it to pass.

Mr. DAWES. We do not repudiate it, neither do we father it.

Mr. WILSON, of Iowa. That is to say that if they can get the West to vote for it, they are willing to take the benefit of it.

Mr. DAWES. We will go for it if you will.

Mr. WILSON, of Iowa. New England is standing off a little on her dignity. She has a tariff that suits her now. She does not ask this bill. The gentleman from Ohio [Mr. DERAND] has undertaken to speak for the West. He gets down on his knees and begs New England to vote for this tariff, on the ground that it will increase their protection. Sir, it is a most singular spectacle. It is something I never expected to witness in this House.

I have no doubt that the gentleman from Ohio will be successful in the appeal which he has made to the New England members, and that this bill will receive their support. This, I presume, will merely be the carrying out of the arrangement which the gentleman from Ohio tells us has been made between the wool-growers and the wool manufacturers. Certain persons residing in the East, in the middle States, and in the West, engaged in raising wool constitute the one party. Certain gentlemen in the East who are manufacturing woolen fabrics constitute the other party. New England is now endeavoring to "fly the track" and repudiate the bargain; and the gentleman from Ohio, on behalf of the other party, insists that this shall not be done. Sir, as a western man, I know nothing of any such bargain; nor will I be bound by any bargain of that kind. Neither will I permit my voice as a Representative to favor any such bargain.

The gentleman from Ohio has said that heretofore all our tariff laws have been in favor of the East; that the great agricultural interests—the wool-growing interests and the flax-growing interests—have never been protected; that the protectionists of the West have always favored tariffs for the benefit of the East, and that now they want a share of protection. Well, sir, I propose now to submit a proposition (and I hope that the gentleman from Ohio has made no bargain which will prevent him from voting for it) which will afford the members from the West an opportunity to vote in favor of a western measure without disturbing the protection which the East now has.

I propose to move, sir, that this bill shall be recommitted to the Committee of Ways and Means with instructions to report a bill which shall embody the first section of the present bill. This is the section which will protect the great wool-growing interests for which the gentleman from Ohio so eloquently pleaded. It is the section which will place the great wool-growing interests within the circle of the protected interests, and will enable them to have a voice in any future readjustment of the tariff. Thus the interest, the protection of which appears to be the paramount desire of the gentleman from Ohio, will be protected.

My motion proposes, in the next place, that the sixth section of the present bill, the section in relation to liquors and cigars, shall be included in the bill to be framed by the committee. Next, that the twelfth section of the bill as originally reported—a section which protects agricultural interests—shall be embraced in the new bill. Next, that the committee shall embody in the bill to be reported by them the reduced duties upon tea and coffee, as already determined upon by the House. Next, that the duty on railroad iron shall be reduced to seventy cents per hundred pounds, a reduction which many of the iron men have told me, within the last few days, they are willing shall be made. Again, that the committee shall embody in the new bill the provisions of the present bill in relation to linseed, flaxseed, hempseed, rapeseed, and oils manufactured therefrom. This is a protection to another of the great interests for which the gentleman from Ohio pleaded. Next, I propose by my motion that the committee shall reduce the other duties embraced in the bill to a standard not higher than the actual necessities of the interests to be affected thereby require, not exceeding, in any case, twenty-five per cent. above the rates now fixed by law; leaving the administrative portions of the bill as they have already been determined upon by the Committee of the Whole, as they are now pending in the House.

I have thus stated the proposition which I design to submit. I trust that the members from the West will vote for it. An appeal has been made to them in behalf of this bill by the gentleman from Ohio, who admits that the bill is full of most objectionable features. He has urged them to vote for the bill for the purpose of securing the benefits it provides for the great interests of the agricultural portions of the country. I ask the members of the West to vote for this proposition, because it will secure protection for those interests, without encumbering the measure with the other provisions which are denounced almost all over the House as iniquitous, imposing duties exorbitantly high. Why, sir, so far as regards the arrangement which, as it is said, has been made between the wool-growers and the wool manufacturers, I find that the benefit to be derived by the wool-growing interests is entirely counterbalanced and neutralized by the other features of the bill. After an increased duty has been put upon wool, an increased duty is placed upon woolen manufactures more than equal to that placed upon wool, it being forgotten in the mean time that by the internal revenue bill which we have passed we have relieved the woolen manufacturers, as well as all other manufacturers, of a part of the internal taxation which they have hitherto paid. What will be the result of this? Wool grown in Iowa cannot be transported to Boston as cheaply as South American wool can be transported there. The eastern manufacturer has in this bill more than a corresponding advantage as compared with the wool-grower. The result will be that the manufacturer of woolen fabrics will be able to purchase just as much foreign wool as he now purchases. You will not, by the passage of this bill, relieve the American wool-grower from the injurious effect of the competition of the foreign wool. In this respect you leave him in the same position in which he is at present.

The SPEAKER. The ten minutes of the gentleman from Iowa have expired.

Mr. GARFIELD. I yield five minutes to the gentleman from New York, [Mr. DODGE.]

Mr. DODGE. Mr. Speaker, I have watched the progress of the debate upon this bill in Committee of the Whole with deep interest, and I might have contented myself with simply casting my vote; but coming as I do from a commercial city, I feel bound to state why I vote "ay" upon this bill.

Mr. Speaker, brought up in my youth in a village which was the seat of a cotton manufacturing industry, I early learned to sympathize with what was known as the "American system;" and from that day to this I have witnessed a great excitement and predictions of ruin to commerce whenever a new tariff has been produced; and yet we have continued to prosper under each successive change; for whenever any one article manufactured here gained such a position as to supplant the foreign, some other article was produced to supply its place in the list of imports, and thus the total amount of importations from abroad have gone on increasing, until now, under the present tariff which was denounced as prohibitory, we have imported a larger amount the last year than in any previous year.

As I have but a few minutes allowed me, I hasten to say that I am impressed with the conviction that the commercial interests of the city which I in part represent will be promoted by the prosperity of the agricultural and manufacturing interests, and by the ability of the country, which alone can come from that prosperity, to buy and pay for the vast amounts of imports which I am confident, notwithstanding this tariff, will continue to flow to this country. The bill proposes a duty on wool and woolen goods which will undoubtedly stimulate the growth of wool to the general advantage of the country. If the increased duties in time shut out a portion of the coarser woolen fabrics there will be an increased ability of the West and South to purchase largely the finer foreign clothes. The increased duty on flaxseed will not only encourage the manufacture of the coarser articles of linen, but will give a greater ability to purchase the finer articles of linen made abroad.

The duty on iron will stimulate the manufacture of rails in the West on the banks of the Mississippi, and thus save the cost of transporting wheat twelve hundred miles by railroad and then three thousand miles across the Atlantic to purchase rails to build roads in the very vicinity of immense beds of coal and iron, the manufacture of which will create a home market for the wheat.

There are many things in the bill which I think should have been amended. The duties on many articles are unnecessarily large, and could have been reduced without any detriment to the country. I trust they will yet be adjusted in the House. But in view of the state of our finances, and feeling the conviction that the increased tariff will, notwithstanding the predictions to the contrary, secure us an amount of revenue equal to the estimates of the Secretary of the Treasury, I shall vote for the bill.

I had hoped that the proposition of the gentleman from Massachusetts [Mr. DAWES] to recommit the bill, with instructions to the committee to report it at the next session, would be adopted, as it would have given time for the better adjustment of the bill to the different interests of the country.

Mr. GARFIELD. Mr. Speaker, at this late hour of the session, and after the protracted discussion in which so many gentlemen have engaged, I would not further trespass upon the patience of the House but for the fact that this bill has been so gravely misrepresented here and so unjustly assailed from without that there has been raised no small clamor against it for iniquities which it does not contain and for omissions which have not been made. This is not the time to enter into any elaborate discussion of those general principles which underlie the most complicated of financial subjects, the trade between the United States and other nations.

The abstract theories of free trade and protection, as laid down in the books, can be of little practical value in the consideration of this bill. The disciples of either school would be puzzled to apply their doctrines to the present situation of our trade and commerce, as has been strikingly illustrated during the progress of this debate. There is scarcely a free trader on this floor who has not, since this discussion began, in order to secure a higher duty on some product in which his constituents were interested, made use of arguments and doctrines which met the hearty approval of the most extreme protectionists; and, on the other hand, when these same protectionists have been desirous of bringing into this country some article important to their people, we have heard them again and again defend their propositions by declarations which would bring down thunders of applause from an audience of free-trade leaguers.

There are two extremes of opinion in this House and in the country to which I cannot assent. During the past year I have been frequently solicited to subscribe publicly to the dogmas of various organizations based on opposite and extreme doctrines in relation to our financial policy; but I have steadily declined to do so, partly for the reason that I could not assent to all their articles of faith, and partly because I preferred to approach the question on which we were to legislate untrammelled by any abstract theory, which, apparently sound, might be impracticable when applied to the facts of our situation. I would not be misunderstood, nor for any political advantage to myself personally would I allow my constituents to suppose that I indorsed any doctrines which, though they should be pleasing to many of them, do not meet with my own convictions of truth and duty.

If to be a protectionist is to adopt the practice which characterized the legislation of Great Britain and the leading nations of Europe for more than two hundred years, and which is now commended to us by some of our political philosophers and statesmen, then I am no protectionist and shall never be one. If to be a protectionist is to base our legislation upon the policy which led the Parliament of Great Britain from the days of Elizabeth to Charles II to forbid the exportation of sheep and wool from the kingdom under penalty of confiscation and imprisonment for the first offense, and torture and death for the second; which led the same Parliament in 1678 to pass a law entitled "An act for the encouragement of woolen manufactures," which ordered that every corpse should be buried in a woolen shroud; a policy which led the Lord Chancellor to declare the necessity of going to war with Holland because the commerce of the Dutch was surpassing that of Great Britain; which led the diplomatists of England to insist in an article in the treaty of Utrecht of 1713, in accordance with which the finest harbor in northern Europe was filled up and hopelessly ruined, lest by its aid the trade of France should eclipse that of England; a policy which tortured industry in every imaginable way, and ignored all the great laws of value, of exchange, and of industrial growth; which cost England her North American colonies and plunged Europe into more wars during the seventeenth and eighteenth centuries than all other causes combined—if to be a protectionist means this, or anything fairly akin to this, then, I repeat, I am no protectionist. That policy softened down in its outward manifestations, but essentially the same in spirit, is urged upon us now by those who would have us place so high a duty upon foreign merchandise as to prohibit the importation of any article which this country produces or can produce. Besides placing ourselves in an attitude of perpetual hostility to other nations, and greatly reducing our carrying trade, we should make monopolists of all the leading manufacturers of this country, who could fix the price of all their products at their discretion.

If, on the other hand, we should adopt the theories of the radical free trader, and declare that our tariff shall be only for revenue, and nothing for protection, and particularly were that doctrine to be put in practice at such a time as in 1836, when we had no debt, and a large surplus in the Treasury to be given away, no one can fail to see that we should break down the dikes which our predecessors have erected for the defense of American industry, and should destroy or seriously cripple our manufacturing industry, which produces nearly one half the annual income of our people, (for the manufactured products of this country in 1860 were valued at $1,900,000,000,) we should revolutionize our industrial system, and place ourselves at the mercy of foreign manufacturers. Let either of these parties frame the tariff, and the result will be calamitous in the highest degree.

If to be a free trader means all this, and pledges us to let the competition of the world come in upon our people, and thus to disjoin and derange the industrial system of the United States, then I am no free trader and can never be. One of the worst features in our industrial system is the irregularity and uncertainty of the legislation in reference to the tariff. It subjects the business of manufacturing to the uncertainty of a lottery investment. If the prohibitionists succeed one year the profits of manufacturers are enormous. If, as is quite probable, the reaction of the next year puts free traders in power, the losses are equally great.

What, then, is the point of stable equilibrium where we can balance these great industries with the most reasonable hope of permanence? We have seen that one extreme school of economists would place the price of all manufactured articles in the hands of foreign producers, by rendering it impossible for our manufacturers to compete with them, while the other extreme school, by making it impossible for the foreigner to sell his competing wares in our market, would have no check upon the prices which our manufacturers might fix upon their products. I hold, therefore, that a properly adjusted competition between home and foreign products is the best gauge by which to regulate international trade. Duties should be so high that our manufacturers can fairly compete with the foreign product, but not so high as to enable them to drive out the foreign article, enjoy a monopoly of the trade, and regulate the price as they please. To this extent I am a protectionist. If our Government pursues this line of policy steadily we shall year by year approach more nearly to the basis of free trade, because we shall be more nearly able to compete with other nations on equal terms. I am for a protection which leads to ultimate free trade. I am for that free trade which can only be achieved through protection.

I desire to call attention briefly to some of the fallacies and misrepresentations by which this bill has been assailed. In the first place it has been stated again and again that this is a New England measure, and repeated attempts have been made to arouse sectional jealousy based on that allegation. I affirm that this is not a New England measure, but more than any tariff ever framed by Congress it protects and aids the agricultural interests of the country. If there has ever been an agricultural tariff this is one.

Look at its provisions. On the subject of wools it is proposed to increase the duty on foreign competing wools from six cents per pound to ten cents per pound, and ten per cent. ad valorem, making the total tariff about eleven and a half cents per pound on foreign wool. It takes two pounds of the mestiza wool of South America to equal one pound of our American wool. It is therefore protection of twenty-three cents per pound on American wool of the finer qualities, which comprise the great bulk of our wool. Now, there is grown in the United States one hundred million pounds of wool per annum, and yet the gentleman from Iowa [Mr. KASSON] tells us that in consequence of the peculiarity of the climate and soil of South America we can never compete with that country in the product of wool. In the same short speech the gentleman confused himself by declaring that wool-growing was so profitable in Iowa that it did not need protection.

Mr. KASSON. I beg to correct the gentleman. I said distinctly that in the West, on the prairies and on the plains where land is cheap, grass abundant, and the winters mild, we should ultimately be able to compete with the world.

Mr. GARFIELD. Then what became of his praise of the superior advantages of South America? I did not so understand the gentleman. Now, sir, I am surprised that any Representative from the State of Ohio, where we have six million sheep and where we raise one fifth of all the wool in the United States, should be found to oppose this measure as being framed in the interest of New England. Let me notice another agricultural feature of the bill. There are fifty ships trading constantly with Calcutta, bringing India flaxseed to our shores. In order to encourage the home growth we have raised the duty on flaxseed from sixteen to thirty cents per bushel, and on linseed oil from twenty-three to thirty cents per gallon; yet gentlemen say this is a bill for New England. If there be any protection in any existing law more clearly in the interest of agriculture, I shall be obliged to any gentleman if he will name it.

Now, I do not deny that there are some features in this bill which I desire to see changed. I believe we ought to reduce and I believe we shall reduce the proposed duty on several articles named in this bill. But if a dozen articles out of the hundreds named in this bill should be somewhat reduced, I would be pleased if any gentleman here would point out its supposed exorbitant features and alleged enormities. It is very easy to join in a general clamor which others have raised, but not so easy to state the cause of the outcry.

Mr. FARQUHAR. I desire to ask the gentleman what, in his judgment, would be the effect of increasing the duty on railroad iron one hundred per cent., as it is increased by this bill, including the amount of deduction made by the internal revenue bill, upon the great interests of the West, now largely engaged in the construction of additional railways.

Mr. GARFIELD. I am willing as a compromise, and to favor the building of railroads, to vote for a reduction of the proposed duty on railroad iron, and I presume the Committee of Ways and Means will agree with me in this. I think we should also reduce the proposed duty on salt, and I have no doubt in several other particulars we will be able to reduce the rate of duty.

Mr. STEVENS. Why not at once come out honestly and accept the proposition of the gentleman from Iowa, [Mr. WILSON], which is a much better and more ingenious one?

Mr. GARFIELD. I will tell the gentleman why before I am done. The gentleman from Iowa [Mr. KASSON] says we ought to adopt the policy of protecting the industries of this country that we can make money at, and if the people cannot make money out of manufacturing enterprises, let them go into something more profitable. He says we can raise grain for the world without protective legislation. Let me repeat to him a little of the history of grain-raising in this country.

There was a time when New England was a great grain-raising country. At a later period New York was the granary of the New World.

Later still the granary was Pennsylvania, then Ohio; then still further to the West. But what is the situation now? New England raises wheat enough to feed her people three weeks in the year; New York raises enough to feed her people six months; Pennsylvania just about enough to supply the wants of her people with none to spare, and Ohio produces a surplus of three million bushels. You must now go to the prairies of the West before you reach the granary of this country.

Mr. ELDRIDGE. I would like to ask the gentleman if New England, at the time she raised a large quantity of grain, was in favor of a tariff anything like this.

Mr. GARFIELD. I do not see the pertinence of the gentleman's question. Now, I wish to say that this talk about putting our people wholly into the business of raising grain for the world is utterly absurd and mischievous. Let me put a practical question to these extreme free-trade gentlemen in reference to this matter. Suppose that to-day we were at war with the great Powers of Europe, and suppose we had always been practicing their precepts and were engaged wholly in raising grain—having no manufacturing establishments, as we should not have had but for the protection that has been accorded to that class of industry by our predecessors—would we not be completely at the mercy of the other nations of the earth?

Edward Everett declared in a speech in 1831, after making a careful estimate, that the extra amount paid by the Government of the United States for woolen blankets and clothing for their soldiers during the war of 1812 largely exceeded the amount of revenue ever derived by the United States from all its tariffs for the protection of all our industry from the foundation of the Government to 1831, and it would have effected a great saving to the Government if Congress had expended many millions of money directly from the Treasury before that war, and had built up and had in readiness these manufactories for the use of the Government during the war.

Against the abstract doctrine of free trade, as such, very little can be said. As a theory, there is much to commend it; but it can never be applied to nations except in time of peace. It can never be applied to the nations of the earth except when they are on the same range of growth and culture. Let war come and it utterly destroys and overturns the whole doctrine in its practical application. Says Prescott:

"Nothing is easier than to parade abstract theories, true in the abstract, in political economy, nothing harder than to reduce them to practice. That an individual will understand his own interests better than the Government can, or what is the same thing, that trade if left alone will find its way into the channels of the whole most advantageous to the community, few will deny. But what is true of all together is not true of any one singly; and no one nation can safely act on these principles, if others do not. In point of fact, no nation has acted upon them since the formation of the present political communities of Europe. All that a new State, or a new government in an old one, can now propose to itself is, not to sacrifice its interests to a speculative abstraction, but to accommodate its institutions to the great political system of which it is a member. On these principles and on the higher obligation of providing the means of national independence in its most extended sense much that was bad in the economical policy of Spain at the period under review may be vindicated."

The example of England has been held up before us. A word about that example. There is a venerable member in this Hall who was a member of this House long before England had professed her free-trade doctrines, while she was one of the most highly protective nations on the face of the earth. For two hundred years she pursued a policy that was absolutely prohibitory; then followed a protective period; now she professes free trade. When she had built up manufactures and was able to compete successfully with the world in matters of commerce, she graciously invites all nations to drop their protective policy and become free traders. It is like a giant or an athlete, who after months of training should ask all the delicate clerks and students to come out and fight or run with him single-handed and on equal terms.

I have before me a statement of the revenues of Great Britain during the last year. Her total revenue for last year was $334,000,000. Of this sum $115,000,000, or thirty-two per cent., she raised from customs, and it is a remarkable fact that that is precisely the per cent. of our revenue that was raised from customs last year. That shows that she raises as much by her tariff as we do in proportion to the amount of our revenue. If gentlemen desire simply to prostrate us before England; if they desire to capitulate to her in commerce as we never have capitulated in arms, let them follow in the lead of these free-trade philosophers. I hold a pamphlet in my hand that was laid upon the desks of members this morning; and in reply to the question of my colleague, [Mr. DELANO,] who in this country is demanding that this bill be defeated or postponed, I will tell him. Here is the address of the Free-Trade Association of London to the American Free-Trade League, and if I had time I would read a few extracts from it. Let me read you some of the headings. Here is one: "protection unnecessary to foster manufactures in their infancy."

They have evidently outgrown their teachers, for John Stuart Mill admits that much. England never taught that doctrine until her manufactures had passed beyond their infancy and stood breast-high with the world in the full vigor of manhood.

I read another sentence from this disinterested lecture of Englishmen to Americans; of the shop-keeper to his customer; of the "nation of shop-keepers" to the nation of customers and grain-raisers that some gentlemen would have us become. "You have most truly remarked in your constitution that protection to the producer means robbery to the consumer."

Now, the gentleman from Iowa, [Mr. KASSON,] who has just made his speech, proceeds upon the doctrine that protection is itself robbery, and of course he will vote against this bill and against all other bills that propose to throw any protection whatever around American industry. Two propositions are before the House to keep us from acting directly upon this bill. The real question is, will we pass the bill after the requisite amendments have been made? But fearing it may pass, the gentleman from Iowa [Mr. WILSON] picks out a few pleasant items that refer mainly to the West, with a sprinkling for the East, and asks us to have the bill sent back to the committee with instructions to report those items alone. He offers a bait to one section of the Union to induce its representatives to neglect another. Mr. Speaker, it is painful to listen to the sectional language we hear every day in our debates. One gentleman sneers at New England, and says, "This measure is a New England pet;" another points at Pennsylvania, and hits her off in an epigrammatic sentence; another turns to the rough, sturdy West, and splinters his lance in a sharp assault upon her. I always understood, during the terrible struggle of the past four years, that we did not fight for New England, we did not fight for Pennsylvania, we did not fight for the West, but we fought for the Union, with all its oneness, its greatness, and its glory. And if we are now to come back, after the victory is won, and hold up our party flags, and talk about "our section" as against "your section," we are neither patriots nor friends.

There should be no division of interest in all great matters of national legislation. And if New England has got further advanced than Pennsylvania or the West and does not need protection so much she must bear with her sisters until they, following in her footsteps, can stand on a basis of equal growth and prosperity. I hope, therefore, no such partial legislation as that suggested by the motion of the gentleman from Iowa [Mr. WILSON] will prevail. I would be ashamed to vote for a measure that singled out the interests of my own State and neglected the interests of others.

Mr. WILSON, of Iowa. Permit me to correct the gentleman, for he is entirely mistaken in regard to the proposition I made. It does not pick out a few interests, but leaves a margin on everything embraced in the bill not exceeding twenty-five per cent.

Mr. GARFIELD. I want to say in regard to the margin of twenty-five per cent. that nothing can be more absurd than to say that any one rate per cent. shall be the limit put upon all articles under any and all circumstances. And that reminds me of a point I was about to forget. I wish to call the attention of the House to the reason why any revision of the tariff is needed at this time. The present tariff law was passed in 1864, when gold was at 200, and it rose during the year to 235. Our tariff was adjusted to that situation of the currency; and what would be highly protective then might give no protection now, or when gold shall be as low as it has been since this House met in session. That is the great trouble with us now. We are afloat without any fixed standard of value, and that which would be a proper duty to-day may be a high duty to-morrow and a low one next day.

I greatly regret that we have not been able to reach nearer to the solid basis of specie, base our currency and all our legislation upon some fixed standard. But while we are tossing as we now are, going up and down twenty and thirty per cent. on gold in the space of a month, it is necessary that we have a tariff, temporarily at least, that will safely shield the interests of the country until we have passed the dangers and reached a more stable financial condition.

One other proposition has been submitted, and with the notice of that I will conclude. The gentleman from Massachusetts [Mr. DAWES] proposes that the whole subject be laid over until another winter. For many reasons I should be glad if we could have more time to perfect the measure. It would be well if we could give two or three months of careful study to the problems connected with this bill. But gentlemen must remember that the chances and changes of the next five or six months may be disastrous to our industries if we do not before the close of this session adopt some legislation to protect them against sudden danger. I am sorry, therefore, that my friend from Massachusetts saw fit to offer that proposition, for it is really another mode of killing the bill, and I can hardly believe he desires such a result.

I hope, sir, that both the propositions to which I have referred will be voted down; that we shall amend the bill in several particulars, making it as equitable as possible in all its provisions; that we shall pass it; and when the country comes to understand clearly what we have done I believe that the clamor of which we have heard so much will cease and that the wisdom of this measure will be vindicated.

Mr. STEVENS. I desire to inquire whether it is the understanding that debate shall now close.

Mr. MORRILL. I propose that debate shall close when the gentleman from Pennsylvania [Mr. STEVENS] shall have concluded.

Mr. STEVENS. Well, Mr. Speaker—

Mr. FARQUHAR. Will the gentleman from Pennsylvania allow me to interrupt him a moment?

Mr. STEVENS. Certainly.

Mr. FARQUHAR. I desire to inquire of the chairman of the Committee of Ways and Means [Mr. MORRILL] whether the arrangement was not that debate should close on the conclusion of the remarks of the gentleman from Ohio. [Mr. GARFIELD.]

Mr. MORRILL. That was the understanding. We did not then know that the gentleman from Pennsylvania desired to speak. The gentleman will recognize the propriety of giving the senior member of the House five to ten minutes if he desires it.

Mr. FARQUHAR. I shall be very happy, of course, to have the distinguished gentleman from Pennsylvania proceed with the debate; but I simply desire to say this: after hearing yesterday the remark of the honorable chairman of the Committee of Ways and Means with regard to the range of debate which might be allowed to-day, I prepared some remarks which I had hoped to be allowed to present, that my people might understand my reasons for the vote which I may have to give. Understanding, however, that debate was to be closed, I cheerfully waived the privilege of making those remarks. I am, however, very desirous to hear the gentleman from Pennsylvania.

Mr. STEVENS. I will surrender the floor to the gentleman from Indiana, [Mr. FARQUHAR,] and then let the debate close.

Several MEMBERS. Let us vote now.

Mr. MORRILL. I certainly desire to accommodate gentlemen of the House; but I did hope that we should be able to reach a vote upon the bill and close it to-day. There are, I understand, several other gentlemen who would like to speak; but it is obvious that if we are to dispose of the bill to-day we must very soon commence to vote. I do not desire to exclude any remarks of the gentleman from Pennsylvania or the gentleman from Indiana; but if neither gentleman desires to occupy any time now I propose, Mr. Speaker, that the several amendments which it was agreed might be offered at this stage of the bill shall now be proposed; that the previous question shall then be called upon the amendments; and after that the motion of the gentleman from Iowa [Mr. WILSON] and that of the gentleman from Massachusetts [Mr. DAWES] will be in order.

Mr. STEVENS. I had intended, Mr. Speaker, to make a few remarks on the merits of the bill; but I see that under the circumstances it might not be fair to other gentlemen. Besides, as a remark made by the last speaker, [Mr. GARFIELD,] with reference to the course of the Committee of Ways and Means upon the bill renders it quite probable that I shall not be able to vote for the bill in the shape it may finally assume, I feel the less desire now to make any remarks in advocacy of the measure.

Mr. FARQUHAR. I desire to say to the House and to the distinguished gentleman from Pennsylvania that my purpose in rising was not to interpose any objection to the gentleman proceeding with his remarks; and I hope that he will not so regard it.

Mr. STEVENS. Not at all; but I see the impropriety of my occupying the time.

Mr. MORRILL. I move on page 9, line six, to fill the blank with "three," so that it will read, "on cotton, raw or unmanufactured, three cents per pound."

The amendment was agreed to.

Mr. MORRILL. I now yield the floor to the gentleman from Iowa [Mr. WILSON] to move an amendment to the following paragraph on page 21:

On iron bars for railroads or inclined planes, made to pattern, ready to lay down, one cent per pound.

Mr. WILSON, of Iowa. I enter a motion to strike out "one cent per pound," and in lieu thereof to insert "seventy cents per hundred pounds."

Mr. FARQUHAR. I move still further to amend by making it "fifty" instead of "seventy."

Mr. ALLISON. I move to make the duty on cotton five cents per pound.

The SPEAKER. That has been already passed, the duty being fixed at three cents per pound by vote of the House on motion of the gentleman from Vermont.

Mr. MORRILL. No one seems disposed to move an amendment in reference to coal, and I therefore demand the previous question.

The previous question was seconded and the main question ordered.

An understanding, by unanimous consent, was entered into that the amendments of the Committee of the Whole on the state of the Union should be considered as agreed to in gross, excepting those on which separate votes might be asked.

The first amendment, on which a separate vote was asked by Mr. ALLISON, was to strike out "nine" and insert "ten;" so that the paragraph will read, "on iron in pigs, ten dollars per ton."

The House divided; and there were—ayes 35, noes 83.

So the amendment was non-concurred in.

Mr. WASHBURN, of Illinois, moved to reconsider the vote by which the amendment was rejected; and also moved that the motion to reconsider be laid upon the table.

The latter motion was agreed to.

The next amendment, on which a separate vote was asked by Mr. DODGE, was to strike out "crash" in the following paragraph:

On brown and bleached linen, damask table linen, brown Hollands, blay, coatings, crash, duck, drills, diapers, and huokabucks, valued at thirty cents or less per square yard, six cents per square yard, and, in addition thereto, thirty per cent. ad valorem.

The House divided; and there were—ayes eighty-four, noes not counted.

So the amendment was concurred in.

The next amendment of which a separate vote was asked was the following:

Strike out the words, "on all bituminous coal mined and imported from any place not more than thirty degrees of longitude east of Washington, fifty cents per ton of twenty-eight bushels, eighty pounds to the bushel;" and in lines two hundred and fifty-five and two hundred and fifty-six, strike out the words, "thirty degrees of longitude east of Washington," so that the paragraph will read:

On candle on cannel coal, and on all bituminous coal mined and imported from any port or place, $1.50 per ton of twenty-eight bushels, eighty pounds to the bushel; on anthracite, and all other coal not herein otherwise provided for, $1.50 per ton of twenty-eight bushels, eighty pounds to the bushel; on coke and culm of coal, twenty-five per cent. ad valorem.

The House divided; and there were—ayes 77, noes 69.

Mr. RANDALL, of Pennsylvania, called for the yeas and nays.

The yeas and nays were ordered.

The question was taken; and it was decided in the affirmative—yeas 75, nays 72, not voting 35; as follows:

YEAS—Messrs. ANCONA, Anderson, Delos R. Ashley, James M. Ashley, Barker, Benjamin, Boyer, Brownell, Buckland, Bundy, Reader W. Clarke, Sidney Clarke, Cobb, Coffroth, Davis, Dawson, De-frees, Dodge, Eggleston, Eldridge, Farquhar, Finck, Glossbrenner, Grider, Aaron Harding, Hayes, Hotchkiss, Asahel W. Hubbard, Chester D. NOT VOTING—Messrs. Beaman, Bidwell, Blaine, Blow, Brandegee, Broomall, Chanler, Conkling, Culom, Culver, Darling, Denison, Dumont, Eckley, Goodyear, Grinnell, Abner C. Harding, Hill, Hogan, Edwin N. Hubbell, Jones, Kuykendall, Lynch, McIndoe, Morris, Noell, Radford, Raymond, Sloan, Smith, Starr, Stilwell, Upson, Warner, and Winfield—35.

So the amendment was concurred in.

During the vote,

Mr. WASHBURN, of Indiana, stated that his colleague, Mr. STILWELL, who would have voted for the amendment, was paired with Mr. BLAINE, who would have voted against it.

The vote was then announced as above recorded.

The next amendment on which a separate vote was asked was the following:

Strike out all after the enacting clause of section eighteen and insert, "that the Secretary of the Treasury be, and he is hereby, authorized to extend to the Alabama and Florida Railroad Company (of Florida) a credit of five years on the duties on the railroad iron and fastenings necessary to relay thirty-seven miles of the track of the Alabama and Florida railroad, between the city of Pensacola and the Alabama State line, from which the rails and fastenings were removed by the rebel forces (against the remonstrances of the officers of said company) during the late rebellion: Provided, That the said railroad company shall first give security, to the satisfaction of the said Secretary, for the payment in coin of such duties with semi-annual interest at the rate of six per cent. on or before the expiration of said credit; and that the said iron shall be used for no purpose but that before stated until said duties have been paid; and further, that the United States authorities can use said securities in payment for any services said railroad company may render for them, should any services be rendered."

The question being taken on agreeing to the amendment, there were—ayes 60, noes 72.

Mr. BINGHAM demanded the yeas and nays.

The yeas and nays were refused.

So the amendment was disagreed to.

Mr. WASHBURNE, of Illinois, moved to reconsider the vote by which the amendment was disagreed to; and also moved that the motion to reconsider be laid upon the table.

The latter motion was agreed to.

The next amendment reported from the Committee of the Whole upon which a separate vote was reserved was on page 39, section twelve, line ten, to strike out "ten" and insert "thirty;" so that it will read, "on apples, garden fruit, and vegetables, thirty per cent. ad valorem."

The amendment was agreed to.

The next amendment reserved for a separate vote was on page 40, line twenty-seven, to strike out "ten" and insert "twenty;" so that it will read, "on potatoes, twenty cents per bushel."

The amendment was agreed to.

The next amendment reserved for a separate vote was on page 41, lines fifteen, sixteen, and seventeen, in regard to lumber, to strike out the words "six dollars or less per thousand feet, one dollar per thousand feet; when valued at over six dollars and," so that it will read, "when sawed and valued at not over ten dollars per thousand, two dollars per thousand feet."

The amendment was agreed to—ayes 72, noes 40.

Mr. FERRY moved to reconsider the vote by which the amendment was agreed to; and also moved that the motion to reconsider be laid upon the table.

The latter motion was agreed to.

The next amendment reserved for a separate vote was on page 40, after line sixteen, to insert, "on tea, twelve and a half cents per pound."

The amendment was agreed to—ayes ninety-five, noes not counted.

The next amendment reserved for a separate vote was to insert after the amendment just read, "on coffee, two and a half cents per pound."

The amendment was agreed to.

Mr. WASHBURNE, of Illinois, moved to reconsider the vote by which the last two amendments were agreed to; and also moved that the motion to reconsider be laid upon the table.

The latter motion was agreed to.

The next amendment reported from the Committee of the Whole, on which a separate vote was demanded by Mr. WILSON, of Iowa, was on page 21, line one hundred and forty-eight, in relation to railroad iron, to strike out "one cent per pound" and insert "seventy cents per hundred pounds," to which an amendment was moved by Mr. FARQUHAR, to strike out "seventy" and insert "fifty;" so that it will read, "on iron bars for railroads or inclined planes, made to pattern, ready to lay down, fifty cents per hundred pounds."

The question being taken on the amendment to strike out "seventy" and insert "fifty," there were—ayes 62, noes 72.

Mr. ALLISON demanded the yeas and nays.

The yeas and nays were ordered.

The question being taken, it was decided in the negative—ayes 57, nays 90, not voting 35; as follows:

YEAS—Messrs. Allison, Anderson, James M. Ashley, Baker, Benjamin, Bergen, Bromwell, Cobb, Cook, Defrees, Donnelly, Eldridge, Farnsworth, Farquhar, Finck, Grider, Grinnell, Aaron Harding, Abner C.

So the amendment was disagreed to.

During the roll-call,

Mr. ANCONA said: My colleague, Mr. DENISON, is absent on account of sickness; if he had been here I think he would have voted with me on all these amendments.

The result having been announced as above recorded,

The question recurred on the amendment to strike out "one cent per pound" and insert "seventy cents per hundred pounds."

Mr. STROUSE. I demand the yeas and nays.

Mr. SPALDING. I move that the House adjourn.

The motion was disagreed to—ayes 43, noes 98.

The next question was upon the motion of Mr. LAWRENCE, of Ohio, to strike out the following section:

SEC. 23. And be it further enacted, That there shall be established in and attached to the Department of the Treasury a bureau to be styled the Bureau of Statistics, and the Secretary of the Treasury is hereby authorized to appoint a Director to superintend and conduct the business of said bureau, who shall be paid an annual salary of $3,500. And it shall be the duty of the Director of the Bureau of Statistics to prepare the report on the statistics of commerce and navigation, exports and imports, now required by law to be submitted annually to Congress by the Secretary of the Treasury; and said report, embracing the returns of the commerce and navigation, the exports and imports of the United States, to the close of the fiscal year, shall for the first day of December next succeeding; and the said Director, as soon as practicable after the organization of this office, shall, under the direction of the Secretary of the Treasury, prepare and publish monthly reports of the exports and imports of the United States, including the quantities and values of goods purchased or withdrawn from warehouse, and such other statistics relative to the trade and industry of the country as the Secretary of the Treasury may consider expedient. And the Director of the Bureau of Statistics shall also prepare an annual statement of all vessels registered, enrolled, and licensed under the laws of the United States, together with the name and tonnage of each vessel, the class to which she belongs as to build and rigging, the name of her home port, and such other information as the Secretary of the Treasury may deem proper to embody therein; and to enable the said Director to furnish the information required the Secretary of the Treasury shall have power, under such regulations as he shall prescribe, to establish and provide a system of numbering all vessels so registered, enrolled, and licensed; and each vessel so numbered shall have her number deeply carved or otherwise permanently marked on her main beam; and if at any time she shall cease to be so marked, such vessel shall be no longer recognized as a vessel of the United States. The said Director shall also prepare an annual statement of all merchandise passing in transit through the United States to foreign countries, each description of merchandise, so far as practicable, warehoused, withdrawn from warehouse for consumption, for exportation, for transportation to other districts, and remaining in the warehouse at the end of each fiscal year; and to aid him in the discharge of these duties, the several clerks now employed in the preparation of statistics in the Treasury Department, or any bureau thereof, shall be placed under his supervision and direction. It shall be the further duty of said Director to collect, digest, and arrange, for the use of Congress, the statistics of the manufactures of the United States, their localities, sources of raw material, markets, exchanges with the producing regions of the country, transportation of products, wages, and such other conditions as are found to affect their prosperity. The said Director shall also collect, digest, and arrange for the use of Congress the statistics of the mining industry of the United States, the number and location of the mines, the products, wages of labor employed therein, and such other matters as may exhibit the condition and affect the prosperity of that branch of industry. And the said Director shall also annually prepare a report, to be laid before Congress, concerning the general course and influence of trade with foreign countries, exhibiting the distribution of the domestic exports of the United States among them, and the exchange of commodities with them, and the cost of production in the respective countries wherever attainable, and by what means the export trade of the United States may be increased; which report shall extend to such particulars and shall be arranged in such manner and form as may be required by the Secretary of the Treasury. And for all these purposes the said Director shall have access to the statistics, papers, and records of the several Departments of the Government; and, in addition to the clerical service heretofore provided, the Secretary of the Treasury shall detail such other clerks as may be necessary to fully carry out the provisions of this act. And the expenses of the Bureau of Statistics for clerical service, publication of reports, stationery, books, and statistical periodicals and papers required by the bureau shall be defrayed, on the order and approval of the Secretary of the Treasury, out of any moneys in the Treasury not otherwise appropriated. And all letters and documents to and from the Director of the Bureau of Statistics, relating to the duties and business of his office, shall be transmitted by mail free of postage.

CONTESTED ELECTION

Mr. PAINE. Mr. Speaker, I rise to a privileged question, and call up the report of the Committee of Elections upon the case of Fuller vs. Dawson, from the twenty-first district of Pennsylvania. I do not desire, of course, that the House shall proceed with the consideration of this question at the present time; my intention is simply that it shall come up as the unfinished business to-morrow morning immediately after the reading of the Journal.

Mr. MORRILL. I move that the House adjourn.

The motion was agreed to; and thereupon the House (at fifteen minutes after six o'clock p. m.) adjourned.

He also, from the same committee, to whom was referred the petition of John P. Brown, secretary and dragoman of the legation of the United States at Constantinople, praying for compensation for services rendered to the United States in the capacity of chargé d'affaires ad interim, reported it back with a recommendation that the petitioner have leave to withdraw his petition and other papers from the files of the Senate; which was agreed to.

Mr. MORRILL, from the Committee on the District of Columbia, to whom was referred a bill (H. R. No. 615) legalizing marriages, and for other purposes, in the District of Columbia, reported it without amendment.

He also, from the same committee, to whom was referred a bill (S. No. 384) to incorporate the Washington Land and Building Company of the District of Columbia, reported it with amendments.

A memorial of the Legislature of Ohio, in favor of an increase of the regular Army, and recommending the appointment of competent volunteer officers to fill positions therein.

WARD R. BURNETT.

Mr. LANE, of Indiana. I am directed by the Committee on Pensions, to whom was referred the memorial of Ward B. Burnett, praying for arrears of pension, to report a bill (S. No. 418) for the relief of Ward B. Burnett, accompanied by a report, and to ask for its present consideration. It is to remedy a mistake, and give him his arrears of pension for three years. The facts of the case are set out in the report, if any gentleman desires to hear it read.

There being no objection, the bill was read twice and considered as in Committee of the Whole. It directs that there be paid to Ward B. Burnett the sum of $540, being the balance of pension to which he was entitled at the rate of fifteen dollars per month from the 4th of March, 1863, to the 4th of March, 1866, and which was improperly retained from him.

Mr. GRIMES. I call for the reading of the report.

The Secretary read the following report:

The Committee on Pensions, to whom was referred the memorial of Ward B. Burnett, having had the same under consideration, report:

The memorialist was colonel of the first regiment New York volunteers during the war with Mexico, during which he was severely wounded, and for which he was pensioned at the rate of thirty dollars per month, being for total disability of an officer of his rank. He received a pension at this rate up to the 4th of March, 1863. In September, 1863, it became necessary for him, under a new law to submit himself to a biennial examination by surgeons appointed for that purpose by the Pension Office. The surgeon who then examined him pronounced him only half disabled, which reduced his pension to fifteen dollars per month.

Since the examination in 1864, he has exhibited to the Pension Office the certificates of Surgeon General Barnes and others, which have satisfied the Commissioner of Pensions that he was entitled to the full pension of thirty dollars per month, and he is now restored to his former pension by the Commissioner, from and after the 4th of March, 1866. The Department not having the authority to pay the pension in arrear, he appeals to Congress for it.

It is obvious that injustice was done the memorialist by the examining surgeon in September, 1863, and that the injuries received in the Mexican war continued during the time his pension was reduced, and are certified to be the same which produced his present entire disability.

The committee therefore recommend the passage of the bill for his relief, which they herewith report.

Mr. GRIMES. I suggest that the bill lie over, and that the report be printed. It is going to establish a very dangerous precedent.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. Objection being made, the bill lies over under the rule, and the order to print the report will be entered.

PORT OF DELIVERY AT WHITEHALL.

Mr. MORGAN. The Committee on Commerce have had under consideration the bill (H. R. No. 611) to provide for making the town of Whitehall, New York, a port of delivery, and report it back and recommend its passage. It is a bill of a single section, and I should be glad to have it acted upon at this time. It is recommended by the Treasury Department.

By unanimous consent, the bill was considered as in Committee of the Whole. It provides that the town of Whitehall, in the State of New York, which by existing law is a port through which imported merchandise may be exported in bond and for drawback to the adjacent British North American Provinces, be constituted a port of delivery within the collection district of Champlain, and that a deputy collector, as now authorized by law, shall there reside, who shall receive the same compensation as is paid to the deputy collector now stationed at that port.

The bill was reported to the Senate, ordered to a third reading, read the third time, and passed.

UNIFORM BANKRUPT LAW.

Mr. POLAND, from the Committee on the Judiciary, to whom was referred a bill (H. R. No. 598) to establish a uniform system of bankruptcy throughout the United States, reported it with amendments.

He also, from the same committee, to whom were referred petitions of citizens of Iowa and Illinois and a memorial of the Chamber of Commerce of the State of New York, praying for the passage of a uniform bankrupt law, and a memorial of the Board of Trade of the city of Charleston, remonstrating against the passage of a bankrupt law, asked to be discharged from their further consideration; which was agreed to.

Mr. SUMNER. I should like to ask the Senator from Vermont, who has just reported the bankrupt bill, whether he expects to proceed with its consideration during the present session.

Mr. POLAND. It is not specially in my charge, but I know of no reason why we should not proceed with its consideration.

Mr. SUMNER. As the Senator reported it I thought it might be specially in his charge, and that he would be able to answer the question.

Mr. POLAND. I am hardly able to give any more definite answer. I know no reason why it should not be proceeded with.

Mr. SUMNER. I hope it may be proceeded with.

PLATES OF WILKES'S EXPEDITION.

Mr. HOWE. I am instructed by the Joint Committee on the Library to report a joint resolution to authorize the use of certain plates of the United States exploring expedition by the Navy Department, and I ask that it may be considered at the present time.

The joint resolution (S. R. No. 126) was read twice, and considered as in Committee of the Whole by unanimous consent. It proposes to instruct the Joint Committee on the Library to grant to the Navy Department the use of such of the engraved plates of the United States exploring expedition, under Captain Wilkes, now in charge of the committee, as may be desired for the purpose of printing a supply of charts for the use of the Department.

Mr. GRIMES. I suggest to the chairman of the Committee on the Library if he had not better amend that resolution so as to require those plates to be deposited in the Navy Department. It will be remembered that we have, in accordance with the practice of other maritime nations, this year established a hydrographic bureau in connection with the Navy Department, where the various charts of the foreign and domestic seas are to be deposited. Among other plates are these that were made to describe the surveys made by the expedition under Commodore Wilkes, which, in the absence of having any better place for them, have been left in charge of the Library. It seems to me that the plates properly belong to that bureau, and should be deposited there.

Mr. HOWE. The Senator from Iowa, I think, is quite right; and when the Navy Department is prepared to take the whole of that paraphernalia, and take care of it in some fire-proof place, the Library would be very glad to get rid of it; but there is an immense amount of it, very little of which the Navy Department would ever perhaps want to use, and it is hardly worth while, I think, to separate the mass. It is very likely to be lost sight of; at least the completeness of it would be broken up. Just now they want the use of some of these plates; this is what the Secretary of the Navy asked for, and it is perhaps all that we had better do at the present time.

The resolution was reported to the Senate, ordered to be engrossed for a third reading, read the third time, and passed.

BILLS INTRODUCED.

Mr. HARRIS asked, and by unanimous consent obtained, leave to introduce a joint resolution (S. R. No. 127) in relation to the American Atlantic Cable Telegraph Company, of New York; which was read twice by its title, and referred to the Committee on Commerce.

Mr. EDMUNDS asked, and by unanimous consent obtained, leave to introduce a bill (S. No. 419) repealing an act entitled "An act repealing certain provisions of law concerning seamen on board public and private vessels of the United States," approved June 28, 1864; which was read twice by its title and referred to the Committee on Commerce.

Mr. GUTHRIE asked, and by unanimous consent obtained, leave to introduce a bill (S. No. 420) to revive and continue in force the provisions of an act granting public lands in alternate sections to the State of Mississippi to aid in the construction of railroads in said State, and for other purposes, approved August 11, 1856; which was read twice by its title and referred to the Committee on Public Lands.

Mr. WILSON asked, and by unanimous consent obtained, leave to introduce a joint resolution (S. R. No. 128) in regard to contracts in the quartermaster's department; which was read twice by its title and referred to the Committee on Military Affairs and the Militia.

ARIZONA AND SONORA.

Mr. NESMITH submitted the following resolution; which was considered by unanimous consent and agreed to:

Resolved, That the Committee on Military Affairs and the Militia be instructed to inquire into the closing of the route from the Arizona line to the port of Guaymas, Sonora, Mexico, by the Liberal or by the Imperial forces in Sonora, and into its effect upon the industrial enterprises of Arizona, and the cost of supplying the United States forces in that Territory, and to report thereon; and if any practical remedy can be devised by which the route can be opened for the transportation of bullion and supplies.

Mr. NESMITH submitted the following resolution; which was considered by unanimous consent and agreed to:

Resolved, That the Secretary of State and the Secretary of War be requested to communicate to the Senate any information they may have in reference to the seizure of property belonging to citizens of the United States, residents of Arizona Territory, on the road from the Arizona line to the port of Guaymas, Sonora, Mexico, by armed bands of Mexicans; and if said bands were organized upon United States territory, and also any information in reference to the alleged massacre of American citizens at Hermosillo, Mexico, by armed Mexicans.

AGRICULTURAL COLLEGES.

Mr. RAMSEY. I move to take up for consideration House bill No. 50.

The motion was agreed to; and the Senate, as in Committee of the Whole, proceeded to consider the bill (H. R. No. 50) to amend the fifth section of an act entitled "An act donating public lands to the several States and Territories which may provide colleges for the benefit of agriculture and the mechanic arts," approved July 2, 1862, so as to extend the time within which the provisions of said act shall be accepted and such colleges established. It proposes to extend the time in which the several States may comply with the provisions of the act of July 2, 1862, so that the acceptance of the benefits of that act may be expressed within three years from the passage of this act, and the colleges required by it may be provided within five years from the date of the filing of such acceptance with the Commissioner of the General Land Office. But the States now represented in Congress which have not availed themselves of the grant of lands contained in the act of July 2, 1862, are so to avail themselves of those benefits by complying with the provisions of that act and of this act, according to their present representation in Congress; and when any Territory shall become a State and be admitted into the Union, such new State shall be entitled to the benefits of the act of July 2, 1862, by expressing the acceptance therein required within three years from the date of its admission into the Union, and providing the college or colleges within five years after such acceptance. Any State which has heretofore expressed its acceptance of the act shall have the period of five years within which to provide at least one college, as described in the fourth section of that act, after the time for providing that college, according to the act of July 2, 1862, shall have expired.

The Committee on Public Lands reported the bill with two amendments. The first amendment was in line thirteen, after the word "office," to strike out the following proviso:

Provided, That the States now represented in Congress which have not availed themselves of the grant of lands contained in the said act of July 2, 1862, be, and they are hereby, entitled to so avail themselves of the benefits thereof by complying with the provisions of the said act and of this act, according to their present representation in Congress.

The amendment was agreed to.

The next amendment of the committee was in line nineteen to strike out the word "further" after the word "provided."

The amendment was agreed to.

The bill was reported to the Senate as amended; the amendments were concurred in and ordered to be engrossed, and the bill to be read a third time. The bill was read the third time and passed.

METROPOLITAN MINING COMPANY.

Mr. WADE. I move to take up Senate bill No. 178.

The motion was agreed to; and the Senate, as in Committee of the Whole, resumed the consideration of the bill (S. No. 178) to incorporate the Metropolitan Mining and Manufacturing Company.

Mr. WADE. I move to amend the bill by striking out the sixth section and inserting as a substitute the following:

*And be it further enacted, That the president and directors are hereby empowered and fully authorized on behalf of the said company to carry on the business of mining iron ore and other native minerals, and manufacturing and preparing the same for market; and to purchase and hold by deed for a term or in fee-simple, such real estate and other property within the District of Columbia and the State of Virginia as may be necessary and proper for the purposes aforesaid; and to issue bonds, not exceeding one half of the capital stock, upon such terms as may be deemed for the best interests of the company: *Provided, That no bond shall be issued for a less sum than $100, or bearing interest at a rate exceeding six per cent. per annum.

The amendment was agreed to.

The bill was reported to the Senate as amended and the amendments made as in Committee of the Whole were concurred in. The bill was ordered to be engrossed for a third reading, was read the third time, and passed.

ELECTION OF SENATORS.

Mr. CLARK. I move now to take up for consideration the bill (S. No. 414) to regulate the times and manner of holding elections for Senators in Congress.

The motion was agreed to; and the bill was read the second time and considered as in Committee of the Whole. It provides that the Legislature of each State which shall be chosen next preceding the expiration of the time for which any Senator was elected to represent the State in Congress, shall, on the second Tuesday after the meeting thereof, proceed to elect a Senator in Congress, in the room of such Senator so going out of office, in the following manner: each House shall openly, by a viva voce vote of each member present, name one person for Senator in Congress, and the name of the person so voted for, who shall have a majority of the whole number of votes cast in each House shall be entered on the Journal of each House by the clerk or secretary thereof; but if either House shall fail to give such majority to any person on that day, that fact shall be entered on the Journal. At twelve o'clock meridian, of the day following, the members of the two Houses shall convene in joint assembly and the Journal of each House shall then be read, and if the same person shall have received a majority of all the votes in each House, such person shall be declared duly elected Senator to represent the State in the Congress of the United States; but if the same person shall not have received a majority of the votes in each House, or if either House shall have failed to take proceedings as required by the act, the joint assembly shall then proceed to choose, by a viva voce vote of each member present, a Senator, and the person having a majority of all the votes of the joint assembly, a majority of all the members elected to both Houses being present and voting, shall be declared duly elected; and in case no person shall receive such majority on the first vote, the joint assembly shall continue to vote for Senator, without interruption by other business, until a Senator shall be elected.

Whenever, on the meeting of the Legislature of any State, a vacancy shall exist in the representation of the State in the Senate of the United States, the Legislature shall proceed, on the second Tuesday after the commencement of its session, to elect a person to fill such vacancy, in the manner provided for the election of a Senator for a full term; and if a vacancy shall happen during the session of the Legislature, then on the second Tuesday after the Legislature shall have notice thereof.

It is also provided that it shall be the duty of the Governor of the State from which any Senator shall have been chosen to certify his election, under the seal of the State, to the President of the Senate of the United States, which certificate shall be countersigned by the secretary of state of the State.

Mr. CLARK. The object of this bill is to secure uniformity in the manner of electing Senators of the United States, that we may avoid the questions and differences that have sometimes existed. The bill provides that the Legislature chosen next preceding the expiration of a senatorial term, shall, on the second Tuesday of its session, each House by itself, vote for some person to represent the State in the Senate by viva voce vote, and shall enter upon the records the name of the person who shall have a majority in each House. On the next day of the session the two Houses are to assemble in joint convention, and if it be found that the same person has been chosen by the two Houses he is then the Senator; but if the two Houses have not selected the same person by the vote of each House then the two Houses, in joint convention, are to proceed to ballot for a Senator, and to continue so to do until they have chosen. It provides first for an attempt to elect by a concurrent vote of the two Houses; and if the two Houses fail to do it, then they meet the next day in joint convention, and by joint ballot elect. I think this statement embraces the provisions of the bill. Its object is to secure uniformity in the election of Senators in all the States. It has been reported from the Committee on the Judiciary.

Mr. FESSENDEN. I would suggest to the Senator who called up this bill that one provision of it may lead to trouble. It provides that the Legislature "shall, on the second Tuesday after the meeting thereof, proceed to elect a Senator in Congress." It not unfrequently happens—it has happened, I think, twice or three times in my own State—that the Legislature does not succeed in organizing until several weeks after the regularly appointed day for the meeting. In my State that arose from the fact—and I ask my colleague whether the constitution has ever been changed in that particular, for I am not aware that it has been—that our constitution required the Senators in the Legislature to be elected by a majority of votes. It has happened twice within my recollection that a majority of the Senate, which by the constitution constitutes a quorum, was not elected by the people at the general election, and consequently for several weeks after the Legislature met there was a difficulty in organizing. It was so, I know, in the year 1853 or 1854. The bill says that the Legislature shall proceed to elect on the second Tuesday "after the meeting thereof."

Mr. CLARK. Say "meeting and organization."

Mr. FESSENDEN. Very well, that will do; but I had proposed to put in "organization" simply, instead of "meeting." I think the amendment suggested by the Senator from New Hampshire would entirely cover the case.

Mr. CLARK. I move to amend the bill in that particular by inserting the words "and organization" after "meeting," in the sixth line of the first section; so as to read, "after the meeting and organization thereof."

The amendment was agreed to.

Mr. FESSENDEN. I see that this bill, as reported by the committee, provides that all elections of Senators by the Legislatures shall be by viva voce vote. That changes the mode of proceeding in several sections of the country, and provides specifically what may not be satisfactory to some persons who have been accustomed to a different mode of proceeding. I think, in New England, there is no such thing as a viva voce vote in the election of officers by a Legislature.

Mr. ANTHONY. There is in our State.

Mr. FESSENDEN. It is not so in Maine; it is not so in New Hampshire, and it is not so, I think, in Vermont or Massachusetts or Connecticut. I do not know how many other States are in the same category. It is generally considered that the ballot is a more free and unembarrassed mode of voting. I doubt very much whether requiring the adoption of this mode of proceeding by viva voce vote will be satisfactory to some sections of the country where they have been accustomed to a different mode.

I suggest this to the consideration of the Senate; and I shall propose to amend the bill by leaving that matter to the Legislatures, unless very good reasons can be given to the contrary. If the committee have considered the question and have come to the conclusion that the best mode is that which they have reported, I should like to hear their reasons, and I may be persuaded to let it go so. I have no choice myself about it; I simply speak with reference to what has been the ordinary custom, I think, in most of the States, and merely mean to express a doubt whether the mode of voting had not better be left to the Legislatures themselves.

Mr. TRUMBULL. This bill was very carefully considered in the committee, and that very question was talked over. The committee were aware that there was a difference in this respect in the different States. I think most of the new States, so far as I am acquainted all the western States, elect by a viva voce vote. The reason that is given for it there, and it has always struck me with considerable force, is that the members of a Legislature act in a representative capacity and their constituents have a right to know how they vote. They are acting for their constituency. Then there is this additional reason: it prevents any deception or cheating by putting in false ballots or double ballots or anything of that kind. Where each person's name is called and he responds how he votes, every member of the body knows and the constituency know how each representative votes. Upon principle it would seem that they ought to have that right. It is desirable to have the practice uniform, and that is the very object of the bill. It occurred to the committee that there could not be any serious objection to voting in this way, and, indeed, no objection except such as would grow out of a former practice. We are all a little wedded to our habits and customs and ways of doing business; but, outside of that, it was thought by the committee that it would be much better to make the mode of voting uniform.

I will say further, that the committee were unanimous in regard to this bill. It is a bill the want of which has been felt ever since I have been a member of Congress whenever a contested election has arisen; and such cases have most frequently arisen out of the difficulty of the two Houses of a Legislature meeting together. It has always been considered desirable that Congress should pass some law on the subject, and I think the Judiciary Committee, of which I have been a member for the last eight or ten years, in discussing this matter have always agreed that it was desirable that Congress should pass some law on the subject and avoid those contests that arise from the fact that a factious opposition in one branch of the Legislature or the other sometimes prevents the two Houses from meeting together. Several occasions have passed by and it has remained, until another occasion recently arose to call attention to the subject. Then some member of the Senate, I think the Senator from Oregon, [Mr. WILLIAMS,] introduced a resolution instructing the Committee on the Judiciary to inquire into this matter, and this bill was prepared in consequence of that resolution which went to the committee. It is impossible to make it conform exactly to the practice which has prevailed in the several States, because the practice has been unlike in the different States. In my State we have always elected by joint convention; we never had separate action in each House; but out of deference to the practice which has prevailed, I think, in most of the New England States, and also in the State of New York, of voting in separate Houses, it was thought better, as no evil could result from that, to adopt that plan for the election of Senators; but in case that failed, to provide that the two Houses then should come together and make an election.

The public interest requires that each State should be represented in the Senate of the United States, and it may sometimes happen that the two branches of the Legislature are of different politics and then will not meet together to elect a Senator. We think the public interest is not subserved by leaving a State unrepresented; the intention of the Constitution is that it should be represented, and it is for the public good that we should have a law that will produce uniformity in these elections and secure representation.

In regard to the suggestion that the Senator from Maine has made in reference to the ballot, I do not see that there can be any substantial reason given against the other mode of voting, and there are some reasons for it, that I think in some of the States they would be somewhat tenacious of. I know it has been discussed in my State; we have had this question of voting by ballot and viva voce very extensively discussed in the State of Illinois during the last ten or fifteen years, and we altered our constitution in that respect.

Mr. FESSENDEN. Do you elect by a viva voce vote?

Mr. TRUMBULL. We elect by a viva voce vote in the Legislature, but our ordinary elections by the people in that State are now by ballot. Formerly every citizen came up to the polls, gave his name, and stated whom he voted for for the different offices, Governor, member of Congress, member of the Legislature, or whatever they might be; he gave an open vote; but that was changed. The matter was very extensively discussed in our State. It was said that a citizen had a right to vote just as he pleased, and nobody else had any business to know how he voted; that that was his own business; but that a representative, who voted for others, had no right to conceal his vote from them.

I have given the reasons which actuated the committee in coming to this conclusion, and I think it will be better to have it uniform. That is the very object of the bill. If you leave it to each State to settle, then there may be difficulty about it, and you may get no election at all. I hope the Senator from Maine will be satisfied to leave it as the committee have fixed it. Perhaps the other way might be thought to be better in some of the States; but I do not see any reason why it should be, except a reason growing out of habit and custom.

Mr. FESSENDEN. I perfectly agree with the committee that it is advisable and very desirable to have this matter regulated by law, and I am very glad to see this bill brought in for that purpose, in order to prevent the failure of elections which sometimes occur in consequence of leaving the States to adopt their own mode of doing it. The thing has been done in my State. I believe the first time I was voted for as Senator—not the first time I was voted for, but the first time I was voted for with any possible chance of success—I was elected eighteen times on the part of the Senate, but the House refused to concur. No choice was made at that session of the Legislature, and the State was unrepresented in the Senate of the United States until the succeeding session.

I should, individually, have no sort of objection to the mode of election provided in this bill. My only difficulty arises from the fact that I fear it may create dissatisfaction in the States that have been accustomed to elect in a different manner. There is something to be said on each side with reference to it. The Senate are aware that many evils are supposed to arise from the fact that in England the votes are given viva voce in the election of members of Parliament, and many have thought that very much would be gained by voting by ballot. The people could then vote as they pleased without being questioned. The only objection that would arise with reference to this representative capacity which the honorable Senator speaks of, is one that will arise from the fact that men might be under restraints from party discipline, which would lead them to act against their conscientious convictions of what was right and proper in the individual case, and which might bring a sort of compulsory pressure upon them which might be objectionable, although I perceive the force of the reasoning of the Senator. Inasmuch as the ballot is the mode that has always been followed in my own State, and inasmuch as I do not see that the mode of voting is material, I shall offer an amendment to the bill in that respect. The great object which we have to accomplish is to secure the election of a Senator, to provide something with reference to the time of election and the manner of proceeding in such a way that the election shall not fail. That I think is very highly desirable; but after all, you cannot secure that beyond the possibility of doubt, because in requiring a majority for an election, as I believe this bill requires, if there be three or four candidates and no one obtains a majority in the convention, there will be no election. There would be a failure in such a case. For the sake of testing the sense of the Senate on the subject, I will move to strike out in the eighth and ninth lines of the first section the words "openly, by a viva voce vote of each member present, name one person for," and to insert "proceed to the election of a;" so that it will read:

Each House shall proceed to the election of a Senator in Congress from said State.

Then at the end of line ten I will move to change the word "name" to "names," and in line eleven to strike out the words "the person so" and to insert "all persons;" and in the same line to strike out the words "who shall have a majority of the whole number of votes cast in each House;" and in line fourteen to strike out the word "such" before "majority" and to insert the word "a;" so that it will read:

And the names of all persons voted for shall be entered on the Journal of each House by the clerk or secretary thereof; but if either House shall fail to give a majority to any person on said day, that fact shall be entered on the Journal.

That I believe would accomplish the purpose of the change, and it would leave every Legislature to settle the kind of vote to be given, whether it shall be by ballot or by a viva voce vote. We saying nothing about it each Legislature then would suit itself as to the mode of proceeding. The time then is fixed; the mode is fixed by which they shall come to a vote, and very properly fixed I think; there is no objection to it; and all that will be left to them will be to say whether they will vote by ballot or viva voce. I think myself that that would be better, and I will move that amendment in order to test the sense of the Senate on the subject.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. That amendment will be read at the desk.

The SECRETARY. It is proposed to amend the first section by striking out in lines eight and nine the words, "openly, by a viva voce vote of each member present, name one person for" and to insert "proceed to the election of a;" so that the clause will read:

Each House shall proceed to the election of a Senator in Congress from said State, &c.

Mr. FESSENDEN. Then I propose to alter the subsequent parts of the section. However, the question may as well be taken on that, and if that should be adopted the other amendments may be made afterward.

Mr. WILLIAMS. I hope that that amendment will not be adopted, because I think that the viva voce mode of voting in a representative body is the correct mode. It generally obtains in the western States, and for the reasons that have been stated by the chairman of the Judiciary Committee. There is no doubt in my mind that the constituents of a member of the Legislative Assembly ought to know how he votes upon the question of the election of a United States Senator; because a member of the Legislature is generally chosen, when an election of that kind is pending, as much with reference to that approaching election as to any other question; and certainly there is no question of greater magnitude that can be presented to the people of a State. Members of the Legislative Assembly are frequently instructed by their constituents as to how they shall vote in the choice of a Senator, and I think those constituents have a right to know as to whether or not that representative obeys those instructions. If voting by ballot is adopted they will not know whether he does or does not comply with their wishes. I understand that it is the duty of a representative in the choice of a United States Senator as much, if possible, to carry out the will of his constituents as it is in the enactment of any law. Certainly upon all questions of legislation the constituents have a right to know the action of a member, and no State Legislature can possibly enact a law that is of more consequence, not only to the State but to the whole country, than the election of a United States Senator.

I think that voting in a representative capacity is altogether different from voting in a primary capacity, although in the State which I in part represent here the viva voce mode of voting prevails at the polls. All our voting is viva voce; and so far as I have been able to judge between that mode and any other mode that is quite as good, if not preferable. I think, therefore, that this mode is preferable on that account.

Then, again, as has been suggested, it avoids any fraud. There is no possibility of committing any fraud in the election of a United States Senator when every man is required to vote viva voce when his name is called, when he is required openly and publicly to designate his choice for that office; and in a body consisting of comparatively a few persons, numbering, perhaps, from twenty-five to one hundred or two hundred, or four hundred perhaps in some of the States, there is more or less danger, where the struggle is severe between aspirants, that fraud in some way may be committed unless every guard is adopted to prevent anything of that kind. This will tend to prevent corruption. Members of the Legislative Assembly, knowing the wishes of their constituents, if they are bound to vote viva voce, will carry out the wishes of their constituents as far as they can; but if they vote by ballot, and if they are approachable by improper means, they may profess publicly to carry out the wishes of those by whom they are elected, and at the same time they may vote contrary to the wishes and the interests of their constituents; and in that way there may be more or less of corruption introduced into the election of a United States Senator.

These elections are not as free from improper influence as they ought to be. It is altogether more easy to influence a body of one hundred men by improper means than it is to influence the entire constituency of any man; and the smaller the number, the easier it is to bring these improper influences to bear. These influences are of various kinds and descriptions.

So long as the representative is required to vote openly and publicly, everybody can determine from that vote as to whether he is honest, as to whether he is trying to carry out the will of his constituents, or as to whether he is actuated and controlled by improper motives in his official conduct.

I do not see that there can be any objection to this mode of voting. None has been suggested, none can be suggested, as it seems to me; and no reason is given for this amendment that I have heard. I have not heard all that has been said, except that in some States the other mode has prevailed. The Constitution of the United States contemplates that Congress shall fix the time and the manner of the election of Senators, and it is as important in these elections to provide the manner as it is the time of the election. If the time simply is fixed, and no regulation made as to the manner, it opens a door through which persons who are so disposed may possibly defeat an election. In every point of view it seems to me that the bill reported by the Committee on the Judiciary is a good one so far as this part is concerned, and ought to be adopted.

Mr. ANTHONY. I quite agree with the Senator from Oregon. I think that the open ballot is the true mode of voting, not only in a representative assembly, but at the polls. It prevents corruption; it prevents deception, and cultivates a manly spirit everywhere. I think it is the only way in which a man ought to vote. The man who votes at the polls votes in a representative character. Every man who votes represents four people who are unable to vote, and he is responsible to them and responsible to the State for the suffrage which he gives. The constitutions of almost all the States, following the Constitution of the United States, require that upon the most unimportant matter a member of the legislative body, at the request of one fifth of the body, shall place upon record his vote. Certainly, in the election of a United States Senator there should be as much provision for responsibility and publicity.

I should like to have the bill amended in one other particular, unless it is desirable to have perfect uniformity, so that the Legislatures may have the option either of voting in the manner provided by this bill or of voting at once in joint ballot; but if it is deemed of paramount importance that the system shall be perfectly uniform in all respects, perhaps it might be better as it is.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The morning hour having expired, it becomes the duty of the Chair to call up the unfinished business of yesterday.

Mr. WADE. I move to postpone all prior orders and proceed to the consideration of the special order which was fixed for to-day at one o'clock.

Mr. TRUMBULL. Let us dispose of this bill.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The unfinished business of yesterday is now before the Senate, being the bill (S. No. 395) relating to the aqueduct bridge of the Alexandria Canal Company over the Potomac river at Georgetown, in the District of Columbia. It is moved by the Senator from Ohio that the Senate postpone the pending and all prior orders and proceed to the consideration of Senate bill No. 280.

Mr. CLARK. I hope that, by the unanimous consent of the Senate, as we have progressed so far with this bill, and it will not probably take much longer time, that we shall be allowed to finish it now. I think it will expedite the business of the Senate.

Mr. WADE. I will not object to that, as I do not think it will take a long time to dispose of it.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. Is the motion to postpone the present and prior orders withdrawn?

Mr. WADE. I withdraw it for the purpose of finishing this bill.

Mr. HENDERSON. I am perfectly willing that the bill of the Senator from New Hampshire [Mr. CLARK] may now be proceeded with, provided it does not displace the pending bill, which is the unfinished business of yesterday. I am willing that that bill may be passed over informally, in order to proceed with this measure.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Chair will put the question. It is suggested that the unfinished business of yesterday be laid aside by common consent, informally, in order that the discussion may proceed upon the bill that was before the Senate at the expiration of the morning hour. Is there any objection to that course? No objection being made, that will be the understanding, and the bill that was laid aside is now before the Senate as in Committee of the Whole, being the bill (S. No. 414) to regulate the time and manner of holding elections for Senators in Congress.

Mr. SUMNER. I was impressed by a remark of the Senator from Illinois, to the effect that while we were undertaking to regulate the election of Senators it would be well that we should require, in all respects, uniformity. I was impressed by that remark, for it seemed to me that it presents a key to this whole question. If this be in reality the key, if it be of importance to require uniformity in all respects, then it seems to me we ought to prescribe in all respects the manner of the election. Nothing should be left uncertain. This, I understand, the bill now before us undertakes to do. The proposition of the Senator from Maine, if adopted, would leave the manner of election in one particular open to the caprice of each Legislature, so that one Legislature might act in one way and another in another way. One might choose Senators by an open vote, and another by a secret vote.

Now, sir, I remark, in the first place, that it seems to me there should be uniformity. The question then is, which system shall be adopted, the system of open voting or the system of secret voting? While I am entirely satisfied that at popular elections the system of secret voting is preferable, and that every citizen, when about to give his vote at any such election, has a right to the protection of secrecy, I do not see my way to that conclusion with regard to votes which are given in a representative capacity. Such votes do not belong to the individual, if I may so express myself, but belong to his constituents. I think a sound policy would require that his constituents should be able to see the vote that is given by the representative; but that can be only where the system of open voting is adopted. The argument, then, for open voting by those who vote in a representative capacity seems to me to be unanswerable in principle.

When the Senator from Maine alluded to popular elections among us, which are by secret voting, and contrasted it with the system adopted in England for the election of members of Parliament, he adduced an example which does not seem to me to be applicable. The voting for members of Parliament is at a popular election, and there, according to the principle I have already recognized, it seems to me that the voter is entitled to the protection of secrecy; but if I may continue the allusion to England, when the representative comes to vote in Parliament, then it seems to me he should so vote that his constituents should see what he does. What is the precedent that we may derive from England? While in the election of members of Parliament there is open voting, we see also that in elections by Parliament itself—as for instance in the choice of Speaker—there is open voting, or voting by viva voce.

Mr. FESSENDEN. We do not do it here in the election of a President of the Senate.

Mr. SUMNER. I know we do not do it here. We do not do it here, the Senator says, in the election of a President of the Senate. Well, I am disposed to think that in not doing it we fail to follow the best example. I was observing, however, that the precedent of the British Parliament, if it be of any value, would be in favor of open voting. There is no question now how the voting shall be at popular elections. The simple question now is on voting in a representative capacity.

Now, sir, glancing for a moment, if you please, at what I suppose is historically the origin of the different systems prevailing in the different parts of the country, I think I do not err if I say that in Virginia and the States to the south of Virginia the system of open voting, even at popular elections, was adopted from the beginning. They borrowed it from the English practice in election of members of Parliament, and then from the practice of Parliament itself. The western States, I need not remind you, were carved out of Virginia. The Northwestern Territory was originally but a territory of Virginia, and I presume that the habit which the Senator from Illinois tells us prevails throughout those States, and in his own State of Illinois, was derived originally from Virginia, as Virginia derived it originally from the English custom. If we come to New England the usage is entirely different. New England borrowed her system of secret voting at popular elections, and then again at elections by the Legislature, from the usage of the corporation which originally settled the country, a corporation of Puritans, following the simplest ways. And history records that all the early elections were determined by secret voting, in which beans were used as ballots. Thus a person was named and each voter dropped a black bean or a white bean into a box in order to determine whether he was for or against him. In this way secrecy was preserved. The rule that prevailed at popular elections was carried into elections by the Legislature.

I believe this is a history of the difference in the manner of election which has grown up in the different parts of the country; the West deriving theirs from Virginia and from England, and New England deriving hers from the practice of a small corporation which introduced the system of secret voting. New England has adhered to her usage from the beginning down to this day, with the exception of Rhode Island, which, it will be remembered, was organized under an entirely different charter, being a charter of Charles II, having some essentially distinctive features.

Now, sir, the question is distinctly presented whether we shall recognize what may be called the New England system of secret voting or the English and almost universal system of open voting. I must say that I am in favor of the system of open voting where persons vote in a representative character, and I think it is becoming to the Senate now, as it undertakes to regulate this matter, that it should stamp it with uniformity, and that this uniformity should be according to the best and the most generous principles, to the end that the representative may be held to the strictest accountability, and that what he does may be in the light of day. "Give me to see."

Mr. SAULSBURY. It is to be regretted, Mr. President, that there is nothing so sacred or so worthy of respect in the past legislation of the country that it is not to be subjected to the innovating spirit of the present times. From the very formation of the Federal Constitution in 1787 to the present time, a period of nearly eighty years, we have found no inconvenience under the present system of electing Senators to the Congress of the United States; or at least it has not been deemed necessary in any past period of the history of our country to change the system which has generally been in use and practice. Each State has been left heretofore to elect its Senators to Congress in such mode and manner as each particular State should determine for itself.

Now, sir, I hold it to be a sound principle of legislation that laws should not be changed, experiments in legislation should not be made, unless there is some practical necessity for the change, unless there is some inconvenience or wrong to be remedied. Has there been any inconvenience in the past that calls for this legislation? Has the legislation of the country suffered on account of the present mode of electing Senators to the Congress of the United States? Has any act passed Congress injurious to the interests of the country owing to this system that would not have been passed if the system now proposed had been adopted?

Mr. President, I hold it to be a sound principle that the Federal Government in its legislative action should not interfere with the freedom of action of the States in reference to a matter in which they are peculiarly interested, beyond the extent of absolute necessity. As much freedom should be left to the several States of the Union in selecting their Senators in Congress, or in reference to other matters in which they have a peculiar interest, as is possible consistent with the general good. Why, Mr. President, if there had been any great practical inconvenience experienced from the operation of the present system, if such a measure as this was called for by any great public exigency, do you not suppose that the men who preceded us in these Halls would have perceived it and would have remedied it? When did the inconvenience begin to be experienced? What was the commencement of it? It may be true that sometimes Legislatures have failed to elect, but very seldom, and I do not know that that has been any very great inconvenience. If they had failed to elect a little oftener perhaps it would have been for the public good, but certainly the legislation of the country has not suffered owing to this fact.

Then, sir, you propose to declare by Federal law that the mode of electing Senators by the States shall be by viva voce vote; and what is the reason urged for it? That the people who elected the members of the Legislature have an interest to know how they vote. Is it possible that we can persuade ourselves that the people who send a representative to the State Legislature do not know for what particular man that representative votes, whether the vote be by ballot or viva voce? I presume there is not a State in this Union that when a Senator is elected by their Legislature the people who send the members there do not know exactly how their representative votes. There are always plenty of aspiring men in every State who wish to come to the Senate of the United States, for now it has got to be a great thing to come to the Senate of the United States, and men go crazy for a seat in this body; there are plenty of aspiring men who will have faithful agents watching the vote of every member of the Legislature, and who will know just as well as the member knows himself how he votes; and no wrong can be perpetrated, I apprehend, upon the constituency of a member of the Legislature because the vote is by ballot instead of viva voce. There may be very strong reasons urged why the vote should be by ballot. In the State which I in part represent upon this floor we have no viva voce vote, either at general elections or in the Legislature, when it comes to vote for State officers or members of the Senate of the United States. There may be members of the Legislature who are under deep obligations to particular individuals, who may be under pecuniary obligations to particular individuals. Such individuals may set themselves up as candidates for a seat in the Senate of the United States; they hold the rod over such a member; they watch his vote. If he votes out viva voce against the particular person who has him in power, that power may be exercised to his ruin, provided the person having the member in his power chooses to exercise it. I am speaking now in case the secret ballot could prevent the vote from being made public.

Whatever advantage, therefore, there may be, I apprehend is in behalf of the mode of voting by ballot. Whatever of wrong might arise, I apprehend might arise from the system of voting viva voce. But, sir, I do not consider it very material as far as the constituency of the member is concerned whether the vote is by ballot or viva voce, because, as I said before, I apprehend the vote would be just as well known by one mode as the other.

But the point of my objection to this bill is that it is an attempt to legislate by the Federal Government in reference to every matter, to leave nothing to the free option of the States and to the State Legislatures. For one, sir, I have seen enough of the grasping power of the Federal Government, the attempt to swallow up every right and privilege of the States, to object on all occasions to any further attempt to extend this power practically in the legislation of the country. Believing that the States ought to be left free as to the mode and manner of selecting their representatives in this body, I am utterly opposed to this bill and shall vote against it.

Mr. GUTHRIE. Mr. President, I believe the Constitution provides that we may pass such a law as this in order to produce uniformity in the mode of electing Senators to this body; and therefore I can see no constitutional objection to the legislation proposed. I am opposed, however, to the first voting provided by the bill. It is provided that each House shall vote by itself and record its vote, and that both Houses shall meet the next day to count over the result, and then if the two Houses have not separately agreed upon the same man they are to have an election by joint ballot. I should have no objection to an election by joint ballot after preliminary nominations in each House. Substantially that is the mode we have practiced in Kentucky from the beginning. The two Houses agree upon a day when they will go into convention and elect a United States Senator. Each House, when the day comes, puts its candidates in nomination and reports them to the other House, and when it is seen who are nominated in each House they proceed to vote. The name of each member is called and he answers viva voce for whom he casts his vote. The clerk records the votes and the two Houses compare them by a committee, who report to each House whether any person has got the majority. We have had viva voce voting always in our legislative elections, as, indeed, we vote at the polls viva voce.

I think mischief might come, and it would be likely to increase, by adopting the provision for the first day's voting, because, unless the two Houses then chance to agree upon the same man, they are not bound by that vote. It is not provided in the bill that nobody else shall be elected by the convention on the second day, but some of those voted for on the first day by the separate Houses. It leaves all that unprovided for.

Then the provision that they shall continue to vote and do nothing else until they elect a Senator may create great difficulty. It may be impossible to secure an election. The votes may be scattered so that they can come to no conclusion; but, according to this bill, when they commence to elect they can do nothing else until an election is secured. In our State we tried the provision of a State law to say when the Legislature should elect, and we, regularly, as if it were to put ourselves in opposition to the statute law of the State, contrive to postpone the election to some other time. It might be a very great convenience to have the election through at once, but if you cannot make it at the time provided, can it be made at any other time? No other business can be done until it is made; all legislation is to be stopped. This feature of the bill, I think, is decidedly objectionable.

I would have very little objection to this bill if it merely provided for an election by a joint vote of the two Houses, whether they were brought into the same room to vote, or whether the votes were cast in separate rooms and compared by a committee, as is done in Kentucky. There is very little difference between those two modes. Sometimes it is convenient, where you have large Halls, to get them together. Sometimes, where you have small Halls, you cannot very well get them all together.

There is something certainly due to the fact that hitherto this entire matter has been left to the States, and the result has been to secure, generally at least, a tolerable share of fairness and success. It is impossible to adopt any mode under which there may not sometimes be a contested election and charges of unfairness. The Senator from Massachusetts thinks that uniformity is a very great thing. Sir, God, in making man and His other creatures, did not set us that example. He made us widely different. In all free countries, where thought and action are free, the mode and manner of doing everything cannot be uniform. That is not to be expected. If the substance, free choice and fair choice, is secured, I think we ought to be satisfied.

Mr. MORRILL. I ask for the yeas and nays on the pending amendment offered by my colleague, [Mr. FESSENDEN.]

The yeas and nays were ordered; and being taken, resulted—yeas 6, nays 28; as follows:

YEAS—Messrs. Clark, Fessenden, Howard, Morrill, Pomeroy, and Saulsbury—6.

NAYS—Messrs. Anthony, Conness, Cowan, Cragin, Davis, Doolittle, Edmunds, Foster, Guthrie, Harris, Howe, Kirkwood, Lane of Indiana, Morgan, Nesmith, Norton, Poland, Riddle, Sherman, Sprague, Stewart, Sumner, Trumbull, Van Winkle, Wade, Willey, Williams, and Wilson—28.

ABSENT—Messrs. Brown, Buckalew, Chandler, Creswell, Dixon, Grimes, Henderson, Hendricks, Johnson, Lane of Kansas, McDougall, Nye, Ramsey, Wright, and Yates—15.

So the amendment was rejected.

Mr. DAVIS. I do not perceive, myself, any necessity, or even propriety, for any legislation upon this subject; but if Congress is to pass any measure on the subject, I see no good sense in prescribing two rules for the government of the election, one to take place on the first day and a different rule to be applicable to the next or any subsequent day. If I understand the bill, on the first day the two Houses vote separately, and on the second day they meet together in convention, and the Journals of the two Houses of the first day are to be read, and if upon reading the Journals of the two Houses, on the second day, it is ascertained that any one man has received a majority of the votes of each House, he is to be declared to be the duly elected Senator; but if, on the contrary, no man has received a majority of the votes of each House, the two Houses then act as a joint convention and proceed to the election of a Senator, upon the principle that if any man receives a majority of the aggregate vote of both Houses in this joint convention he is to be the Senator.

I think the last is the simplest rule and most practical. That rule would always, or nearly always, result in the choice of a Senator. The rule, though provided here for controlling the election on the first day, practically would not produce an election at all, because it would often occur that the same man would not get a majority of the votes of each House. Why, then, postpone the election from the first to the second or subsequent day? Why not adopt the rule for the first day's voting that is adopted for the subsequent day's voting, and proceed to an election upon the simplest rule and in the shortest time practicable? I suppose that in many cases it would result in no election whatever on the first day, and that the convention of the two Houses that is provided for would necessarily be required; and in all cases where the convention became necessary, the simple rule of electing upon joint ballot, and he who received the majority of the whole vote upon joint ballot being elected, would be adopted. I am in favor of adopting it for the first day's operation.

My colleague stated correctly what has been the practice of our Legislature from the beginning of the State, and it seems to me that that is a simple, certain, and equitable mode of making the election. It does not introduce the confusion of bringing the two Houses into one Chamber and there having a commingled vote, but its practical effect is the same. The two Houses vote separately for whom they please. They interchange messages; and upon the interchange of messages, if it is found that any candidate has received a majority of the aggregate vote of both Houses, he is declared elected.

I do not believe that mode or principle of election can be improved. If the Senate is to legislate on the subject at all, I think with my colleague, that that mode and principle of election ought to be prescribed.

I concur in another objection made by my colleague to this measure. When the two Houses have met in convention no legislative business can proceed until an election is effected. We do not know what inconveniences such a rule might introduce until it is tested by experience; but we may well imagine great difficulty and great delay in making an election at all. It might be that the two Houses in joint meeting would have to proceed for a series of consecutive days in ineffectual efforts to make an election, because no single candidate would receive a majority of the whole number of votes cast, and not only the whole number of votes cast, but what is a proper principle, I think, a majority of the whole number of votes in the two Houses of the Legislature in the aggregate. To suspend the course of business until an election is effected upon that principle might at least seriously obstruct the legislative proceedings of the States, and in that point of view, I think, it is objectionable.

I believe, myself, that this subject might as well be left entirely to the action of the State Legislature; but if Congress is determined to take up the subject and to pass a law upon it, I think the law might be in a better form than this bill is, and I hope it may be the pleasure of the Senate to refer the bill back to the Committee on the Judiciary, and that that committee may adopt the plain, simple rule of requiring a majority of the whole number of members of both Houses, either by a separate vote or upon a joint ballot, and declaring that the man who receives such a vote as that shall be the Senator-elect.

Mr. CLARK. I move further to amend the bill in the fifth line of the second section by inserting the words "and organization" after the word "commencement."

The amendment was agreed to.

Mr. CLARK. I move further to amend the bill in the ninth line of the second section by inserting after the word "Legislature" the words, "shall have been organized and;" and in line ten, after "notice," to strike out "thereof" and to insert "of the vacancy."

Mr. JOHNSON. How will it read then?

Mr. CLARK. "And if a vacancy shall happen during the session of the Legislature, then on the second Tuesday after the Legislature shall have been organized, and shall have notice of the vacancy."

Mr. TRUMBULL. I suggest to the Senator from New Hampshire that that can hardly be necessary. This provision is "if a vacancy shall happen during the session of the Legislature." Is it a "session" of the Legislature until it is organized?

Mr. CLARK. It may be. The Legislature may be together and sitting, but not organized. I want to avoid that difficulty.

Mr. TRUMBULL. I have no objection to it.

Mr. CLARK. I think it would make it a little more specific to insert these words.

The amendment was agreed to.

Mr. SHERMAN. I think myself that we should have uniformity in the mode of electing Senators of the United States, if possible, but practically it will be very inconvenient to prescribe one rule to affect the action of thirty-six different political bodies. Some difficulties occur to me in reducing this to practice, which I think ought to be considered. Many of the Legislatures are elected biennially; it is so in my own State and in many of the States. Some of them are elected two years before the vacancy occurs. Under this bill the Legislature would be compelled to elect at least fifteen or eighteen months in some of the States before the vacancy occurs. This may be convenient sometimes, but at other times it may be very inconvenient. It may be better to postpone the election until near the time of the vacancy, or it may be wise when the Legislature convenes to act on the subject. That depends on circumstances. Now, to prescribe a uniform rule to compel the Legislature to act at a particular time in every case might be very unwise.

Then there is another objection made by the Senator from Kentucky, [Mr. GUTHRIE,] which it seems to me has a good deal of force. You stop all the proceedings of the Legislature until they act on the question of electing a United States Senator. It is the interest of every State to have a Senator and there will always be a strong inclination in every State to have that election disposed of, because it generally stands in the way of public business; but is it wise for Congress by an arbitrary enactment to prevent a Legislature from doing any business until this question is disposed of? It seems to me it is better to leave it to the Legislature.

Practically there has been but very little difficulty in this matter since the foundation of the Government. It is always the interest of every State to elect a member of the Senate; but where the two Houses disagree there is sometimes a vacancy until the matter can be submitted to the people. I do not think that practice has resulted in any evil. The various States elect in different modes. In my State they elect by joint convention and by ballot. I would much prefer to substitute the viva voce voting for the ballot, but I see no reason for having an additional mode of electing before the joint convention; that is the election by the separate Houses. It is a complex mode. I know our people would be unaccustomed to it. The first vote prescribed by this bill may disclose a difference between the two Houses; and then how easy will it be for a portion of each House to prevent an election. Suppose after the first effort has been made to elect by a separate vote, they go into joint convention, how easy it will be to organize a third party, such as exists in almost every election of United States Senator. It is very rare that one man on the first ballot would get the requisite majority. How easy then to organize a third party, composed say of a few men holding the balance of power between two rival parties, and thus stop the Legislature of the State from doing any kind of business, thus giving a few men combining together the power to control the majority or else to stop all the business of the Legislature. Is not that a possible and a probable contingency? Has it not occurred over and over again?

Such things have occurred in several States. In my State a small minority of six men have by simply holding out compelled the majority to yield. If, in addition to the ordinary power of such a small minority, they have the power to stop all action by the Legislature upon all legislative business, is it not a very great power? If we pass this bill a Legislature could only elect a Senator in the mode prescribed, because this bill will be passed in pursuance of an express provision of the Constitution, and when we step in and prescribe the mode of electing a Senator, the Legislature has no right to vary that mode; and therefore, under the language of this bill, the whole proceedings of the Legislature must stop until either this minority faction is bought off, or got off, or yielded to; and thus the will of the people in the election of the Legislature may be defeated. I think it is much better to leave the mode and manner of electing Senators to the people of the States themselves through their Legislature, to allow the Legislature, if necessary, to change the law or modify it to suit the exigency. It makes no difference to the United States; it is only a question as to the mode and manner of electing a Senator.

I think it is better for us, on a question so important as this, to follow the example of those who have gone before us, as for seventy years we have had no substantial trouble, only occasionally a vacancy from a State. I think it is better to run the risk of an occasional vacancy in a State, an occasional disagreement, rather than to prescribe by an arbitrary rule a mode which may sometimes be defeated by a small minority, and thus stop the whole legislative business of the State. This is the view that occurs to me. I would not be willing to vote for this bill with my impressions. If a bill is to be adopted, I would be in favor of striking out the intermediate vote by separate Houses, and coming directly to the joint vote viva voce at once, so that there will be no chance for combination, because it seems to me this preliminary vote (which is entirely new to me, but I am told is adopted in some of the States,) will invite just such combinations as will tend to prevent an election and postpone all legislative business by disclosing, in advance, the preference of every member of both branches of the Legislature.

Mr. CLARK. The fact that different States have adopted different methods of choosing Senators accounts probably for the fact that different Senators prefer different methods. In my State we have always elected by a concurrent vote. I prefer that method of electing. In the State of Kentucky they have elected by a joint ballot. The Senator from Kentucky prefers that method of election.

Mr. DAVIS. In Kentucky the Houses vote separately, but the votes are counted as though they voted together.

Mr. CLARK. That amounts to the same thing.

Mr. DAVIS. Practically.

Mr. CLARK. They only give their votes in two ballot-boxes, which are brought together and counted just as if they had met together in the same Chamber. It is practically the same thing; but the two Houses do not actually come together to do it. The Senators from Kentucky prefer that method; it is the method to which they have been accustomed. So the Senator from Ohio prefers the method to which he has been accustomed. The Senator from Vermont probably would prefer the method to which he has been accustomed. The Senator from Maine prefers the method to which he has been accustomed and the vote by ballot. The Senator from Rhode Island prefers his method and the vote viva voce. Now, the object is to have uniformity in the mode of electing, and of course we have got, each of us, to surrender something or to unite on a plan which shall combine the whole of these things.

The committee propose, in the first place, to let the two Houses vote in the regular way, acting separately, for Senator, each House by itself. If the two Houses happen to elect the same man, then he is to be the Senator of the United States, selected in the ordinary way; but if there is found to be a disagreement, then the two Houses, for the purpose of settling that disagreement, combine their votes, and in joint convention select a Senator. That is to prevent disagreement.

I think, during the existence of the Government, in New Hampshire we have never failed in more than one instance in electing a Senator by concurrent vote. In Maine the Senator says he was balloted for some eighteen times, and then they failed in regard to it. Now, to prevent such a failure and to combine the two methods together, the committee have reported this bill, first to let the two Houses act by concurrent vote, and if they fail in that way then to let them act in joint convention. It secures an election in the end.

The objection made by one of the Senators from Kentucky can hardly, it seems to me, be worthy of much notice, that one of the Houses may have elected one man, the other House may have elected another man, and then when they come together in joint convention they may choose a third man. Why not? If the House selects a man not agreeable to the Senate, and the Senate a man not agreeable to the House, and they can together in joint convention agree upon a third man and thus select a man acceptable to them, why not take him? I do not see any objection to that. It secures undoubtedly a proper man, and it results in securing at least a Senator, so that there shall be no vacancy.

Objection is made to the provision that the convention shall keep voting until a Senator is elected. That cannot, it seems to me, be any interruption to the business; and it is for the purpose of securing an election of the Senator that the two Houses shall not separate and afterward, on account of some difference, refuse to go into joint ballot again and elect. I do not believe it would occur once in a hundred years that any third party would stand out in the way which the Senator from Ohio suggests and thus prevent the ordinary legislation of the State. The very fact that they were prevented from proceeding with other business might operate to induce them to come into a choice, because the business might be pressing behind, and they might say to themselves, "We cannot do any business until we settle this election, and therefore we will settle it." It seems to me that it is a wise plan to secure the election of a Senator in the end.

Mr. SHERMAN. In a memorable case in the House of Representatives some years since the same rule applied, and legislation was delayed for nine weeks at a time because of the failure of the House to elect a Speaker. The Senate could not proceed with business until the House was organized; and a few men, six in one instance and fifteen in another, held the balance of power for weeks and weeks, almost creating a revolution in this country.

Mr. CLARK. And yet if that House could have gone to other business without electing, what would have been the consequence?

Mr. SHERMAN. The only way that difficulty was got over was by violating the very rule here prescribed; that is to say, the House concluded finally to make an election by a plurality. If the provision in this bill had been the law of the House of Representatives and a plurality could not elect, they never would have organized except by a revolution.

Mr. CLARK. It is for the purpose of securing uniformity in these cases that the bill provides that the election shall be by a majority. I do not think there is any great danger of such events occurring. They occur in a House like that of Representatives in high party times where each party is very tenacious of its candidate; but I do not think they would be likely in a State Legislature where the members were voting for a United States Senator. It seems to me the bill is wise as it is. It clearly allows an adjournment of the joint convention from day to day, because a body so constituted has power by parliamentary law to adjourn. It does not prevent that.

Mr. HOWE. I wish to move an amendment, the importance of which was suggested by the Senator from Ohio. I move, in the first section, lines thirty-two, thirty-three, and thirty-four, to strike out the words "vote, the joint assembly shall continue to vote for Senator without interruption by other business until a Senator shall be elected," and in lieu of them to insert "day, the two Houses shall meet in joint convention at twelve o'clock meridian of each succeeding day and take at least one vote until a Senator shall be elected;" so as to read:

And in case no person shall receive such majority on the first day, the two Houses shall meet in joint convention at twelve o'clock meridian of each succeeding day and take at least one vote until a Senator shall be elected.

Mr. SHERMAN. I suggest to my friend from Wisconsin whether it would not be a great deal better to substitute a plurality rule after a certain number of ballots. ["No." "No."] Then you will have difficulty. Under this bill I believe that after all the members have disclosed their preferences, either ambitious or corrupt minorities, factions, may defeat an election, may prevent any business being done, and may create just the very condition of things that occurred once in Ohio where they almost got to fighting each other, and which existed twice in the House of Representatives, when if it had not been for the adoption of the plurality rule when General Banks was elected Speaker we should never have organized the House, and if it had not been for the withdrawal of one of the candidates in the other case to which I have referred there would not have been an organization then. We shall get in the same difficulty here that we had in the House of Representatives on those occasions.

Mr. CLARK. Let us try this first and see.

Mr. HOWE. Managing elections which are necessary to the organization of a House, is one thing; controlling elections which are only to choose a member of another House, is another thing. It seems to me the proper penalty, and the only proper penalty, to impose upon a State for omitting to elect a Senator is to leave it without that much representation in this body. I do not see any necessity for imposing any other penalty; but it seems to me that it is proper, while we are prescribing regulations, to require the Legislature to meet every day and to make a bona fide attempt each day of the session to make an election, requiring the two Houses to come together for that purpose; but if being together they refuse to concur, a majority of them, in the selection of a man, then the penalty falls upon the State of being without one Senator in this body. I do not care to impose any other.

Mr. JOHNSON. The amendment suggested by my friend from Wisconsin would not leave the State unrepresented, which he seems to suppose is a sufficient penalty, because they are to continue to sit from day to day until they elect, as the amendment reads. They would not be at liberty to adjourn until there was an election. Therefore his object, if his amendment stands as it is now worded, would not be accomplished. But I rose not for the purpose of saying that so much as to say that I think the bill as it stands with the amendment suggested by the Senator from Maine should be passed.

Mr. FESSENDEN. The amendment I moved was negative.

Mr. JOHNSON. I meant the first amendment suggested, adding the words "and organization" after the word "meeting." The first section of the bill provides that each House is to vote by itself. The Senate are of course aware that in the beginning—and the same opinion continued to be entertained a good while after the Constitution was adopted—it was very much doubted by some of the best men of the country whether any election could be made by the Legislature in any other way than by the votes of both branches acting concurrently where the Legislature of the State consisted of two bodies. The language of the Constitution is that "the Senate of the United States shall be composed of two Senators from each State, chosen by the Legislature thereof." I do not speak with certainty, but either Chancellor Kent or Mr. Justice Story, in his Commentaries, has said that it was exceedingly doubtful whether the true meaning of that provision is not that the choice is to be made by the Legislature legislatively, and of course that they are to act in the way in which they are alone authorized to act by their State constitutions under which they exist in the passing of laws. Whether the doubt was originally well founded I am not prepared to say; I rather think it was; but the States have acted upon a different construction of the Constitution since. They have, however, adopted no uniform rule, and we have seen, upon more than one occasion, the embarrassment consequent upon the absence of a uniform rule. It was illustrated in the recent case of the gentleman who supposed himself to be a Senator from the State of New Jersey. I do not propose, of course, to argue that question again; but that was a difficult question, in the judgment of a great many; the Senate were nearly equally divided on the matter; and I think every member of the Senate who reflects upon the circumstances of that case, and the actual and honest differences of opinion which prevailed among ourselves, must have come to the conclusion that it is very desirable to adopt some uniform rule if we can do it. This bill proposes to adopt a uniform rule; it places it out of the power of the States to adopt any other; and not only that, but it makes it the imperative duty of the States to elect according to this prescribed rule.

Now, my friend from Ohio says that the bill is very objectionable, in providing that where the Houses fail to agree upon a Senator, they are to meet in joint meeting and to do nothing else as a Legislature until a Senator is elected. That, instead of being an objection, recommends the bill to me. The Government of the United States cannot go on without a representation in the Senate of the United States. The Constitution assumes that every State in the Union will elect Senators; and the Constitution in its spirit is obligatory upon every State to make such an election. The only way, as I think, to compel the States to perform that constitutional obligation is to stop the wheels of the government of the State until that higher duty is performed. It is infinitely a higher duty upon the part of the States and the members of the Legislatures of the several States to elect Senators of the United States, the Government of the United States being important to all the States, than it is to go on with their ordinary legislation. The wheels of the government of the State may be stopped, and the business of the country may not be injured, the character of the country may not in any manner be affected, the power of the Government may in no manner be diminished by that; but all of this, or may be, the result of a failure to elect Senators to the Congress of the United States. It is no penalty at all which provides that the Legislatures are to remain in session until they make the election. It is merely prescribing that as a duty. They are subjected to no penalty for not performing it. They are brought together merely by this bill and told, "The business of your Legislature is to be arrested until this paramount duty which you owe to the Constitution of the United States is performed of electing a Senator to represent your State in the Senate of the United States." Not only is the particular State interested in having that duty performed, but every State is interested. I have as much interest in having the State of Ohio represented upon this floor as in having my own State represented. I am not here as the representative of Maryland, nor is the Senator from Ohio here as the representative of Ohio. We represent our respective States because we represent all the States; and it is our duty, and the same duty, to take care of the interests of all as to take care of the interests of our own State; and (to state it in other words) we do take care of the interests of our respective States when we take care of the interests of all, for we are bound altogether, to stand or to fall together, as we generally and not individually prosper.

As has already been said, there can be no doubt about the authority to pass the bill before the Senate, and I have no doubt that the framers of the Constitution anticipated as very possible that the time would come when it would become necessary for Congress to interfere in this matter. They would not have made the provision except on account of an anticipation that the necessity for its exercise would subsequently arise. They therefore said in the Constitution that "the times, places, and manner of holding elections for Senators" "shall be prescribed in each State by the Legislature thereof; but the Congress may at any time, by law, make or alter such regulations except as to the place of choosing Senators." The selection of the place they left entirely to the authority of the State; but as to how they shall elect the Senator, what regulations shall be prescribed for that purpose, the Constitution provided should be (if Congress should see proper to exercise the power afterward) decided upon by Congress. Why put that provision in the Constitution? Is it not obvious that it was inserted for the purpose of accomplishing some uniform regulation? Congress cannot adopt partial regulations, regulations to be enforced in Maine, and different regulations to be enforced in Maryland. The regulations which Congress are authorized to pass, and are only authorized to pass, are regulations which are to apply equally to all the States. The Convention, therefore, looked to the coming of a period when different regulations might exist in the several States, or no regulation might exist, which would render it the duty of Congress, with a view to the interest and the safety of the Government, to guard against the mischief consequent upon the absence of regulations, or the existence of improper regulations, to provide for both cases.

As to the objection stated by my friend from Ohio, that this bill will enable some factions minority of each branch to defeat an election, they can do it now; they have done it, according to his own statement. It has happened in Ohio; it has happened in Tennessee; it has happened in two or three other States. I think it happened in my own State in relation to one Senator. The existence of that was a mischief, an admitted evil. It cannot happen under the provisions of this bill, because it is incumbent on the Legislature to meet on a certain day and act, each House in its separate legislative capacity, and failing to accomplish the end, then it is made their duty to meet in joint meeting on the subsequent day, and there continue in session until they do elect, all other business being arrested.

It appears to me—I thought so in committee, and I have but been confirmed in the opinion since—that it is the interest of the Government and in a great measure the safety of the Government that this bill or some bill like it should become a law.

Mr. HOWE. The Senator from Maryland seems to think that the effect of the amendment proposed by me would be such as to require the Legislature to continue permanently in session until a Senator was elected, and would in fact deprive them of the power of adjourning until that event took place. I did not intend that effect. I think I have not given it that effect. The amendment simply requires the two Houses, while they are in being, to meet each day, and to take at least one vote. When they have taken one vote they have fulfilled the requirement of the law, as it will be if the amendment is adopted, and having taken that one vote the joint convention will be at liberty to dissolve, and, having dissolved, each House will meet by itself and go on with its ordinary business, and in the prosecution of its ordinary business each House can vote to adjourn the body, and when the Legislature is adjourned the two Houses are no longer in existence, and the law will cease to act upon them. But if I am mistaken in supposing this is the true interpretation of it that can be corrected by inserting after the words "each day" the words "of the session."

Mr. FESSENDEN. Suppose they do not elect, can a succeeding Legislature elect?

Mr. HOWE. So long as there is a Legislature in being it is made the duty of the two Houses composing that Legislature to meet every day.

Mr. FESSENDEN. That is true, but the bill says in the beginning "the Legislature of each State which shall be chosen next preceding the expiration of the time for which any Senator was elected to represent said State in Congress." That is the Legislature designated.

Mr. TRUMBULL. The second section meets the case now suggested.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. (Mr. POMEROY in the chair.) Does the Senator from Wisconsin modify his amendment?

Mr. HOWE. Yes, sir; by inserting the words "of the session" after "each day." And now one word upon the question whether we should impose any other penalties upon the State for not electing than simply the loss of its representative here. The Senator from Maryland puts this matter of electing Senators in the light of a duty—a duty which the State owes to the Government; and so he is for imposing very severe penalties upon the State for a neglect or an omission or an inability to discharge that duty. I have always held, and I still hold, that this matter of electing Senators and Representatives to Congress is not a duty charged upon the State, but a right conferred by the Constitution upon the States.

Mr. JOHNSON. Will the Senator permit me to ask what would be the effect upon the Government if a majority of the States declined to exercise the right, as he calls it, of not sending representatives to the Senate? The wheels of the Government would be stopped.

Mr. HOWE. If a majority of the States should neglect to avail themselves of the right to choose Senators and Representatives the consequence would happen that a majority of the States would not be represented here, but that the wheels of the Government would be stopped thereby I do not concede for a moment. I deny it utterly. If it be a right, as I assume, and not a duty, no penalty falls upon the nation because a State neglects to avail itself of that right. The nation would survive this neglect on the part of a majority, or four fifths, or nine tenths of the States. I have once said, and I still repeat, that as long as any two States or any one State avails itself of this right, and sends its Representatives here, then you have a national Legislature; a Legislature which can enact laws for the whole Union.

I am sorry to hear, especially from the Senator from Maryland, these very extreme remedies urged upon us for the mere neglect of a State right. I am for upholding the rights of the States; I am for upholding the right of a State to elect Representatives; but I am for upholding the right of a State to omit to elect Representatives, and I am for upholding that view of the Constitution under which the authority of the nation is not impaired simply because a State neglects its rights. When a State disregards a positive injunction, violates a duty imposed upon it by the Constitution, then I agree with the Senator from Maryland that very extreme penalties may be resorted to. But I recollect that when I advanced the doctrine that when States had not only refused to choose Senators and Representatives to Congress, but had actually taken up arms to overthrow the Government of the United States, we had a right to stop the wheels of their government and to prohibit them from making laws for the government of their own citizens, the Senator from Maryland objected to it as rather extreme and radical doctrine; but here to-day, for the simple omission to elect its own Senator, I find the Senator from Maryland insisting that we have a right to deprive a State of the power of making laws for itself, going to the whole extent of whatever I claimed we might rightfully do for the crime of revolution and rebellion itself. Hereafter I have only to say that I hope no man will class me among the radicals. [Laughter.]

Mr. TRUMBULL. Before the question is taken on the amendment of the Senator from Wisconsin, I suggest to the Senator that he should modify it so as to avoid the objection that was suggested that they should meet from day to day indefinitely. It should be during the session of the Legislature.

Mr. HOWE. I have put that in.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The question is on the amendment of the Senator from Wisconsin as modified.

The amendment was agreed to.

Mr. HENDERSON. In lines twenty-nine and thirty of the first section I move to strike out the words "a majority of all the members elected to both Houses being present and voting." I do not see that we have a right here to determine what shall be the Legislature of a State. The Constitution provides that Senators shall be chosen in each State by the Legislature. Suppose the Legislature of a State is composed, as was once the case in Pennsylvania, of only one branch; there can be no doubt that the people of a State may by their constitution abolish their Senate and have a Legislature composed of but one branch; and I do not see that the Federal Government could interfere with it.

It will be observed that this bill provides first that the Senator shall be elected by the two branches of the Legislature. To that I do not object with the facts before us, because every State now has two branches to its Legislature. It then provides that the Senator shall be voted for in each House separately, and it will be observed that a different rule is prescribed for the election before the two branches acting separately from that prescribed for them when they go into joint session. In all the western States we elect by joint session. The constitution of my State provides that the election shall be by the Legislature in joint session. Hence this law will override the constitution of the State of Missouri. There is no provision in our constitution that we shall elect in the separate branches of the Legislature; and the member of the Legislature who refuses to go into joint session for the election of a Senator certainly will do so in the face of the constitution and in obedience to this law when it shall have been passed. It is provided in this bill that—

At twelve o'clock, meridian, of the day following that on which proceedings are required to take place, as aforesaid, the members of the two Houses shall convene in joint assembly and the Journal of each House shall then be read, and if the same person shall have received a majority of all the votes in each House, such person shall be declared duly elected Senator to represent said State in the Congress of the United States; but if the same person shall not have received a majority of the votes in each House, or if either House shall have failed to take proceedings as required by this act, the joint assembly shall then proceed to choose, by a viva voce vote of each member present, a person for the purpose aforesaid, and the person having a majority of all the votes of the said joint assembly, a majority of all the members elected to both Houses being present and voting, shall be declared duly elected.

What is "a majority of all the votes in each House?" Is it a majority of all elected? Surely not. It means a majority of what the State constitution may determine to be a quorum. A Senator can be elected in the New England States by a majority of a quorum. It is in the power of the several States, I apprehend, to make a quorum consist of less than a majority of all the members elected. Is there any power in Congress to say that a State Legislature for legislative purposes shall consist only of a majority of all elected? I think not. Suppose the constitution of the State of Missouri provided that for all legislative purposes one third of the members elected to each branch of the Legislature should constitute a quorum to do business; if they have a right to do it for legislative purposes they have a right to do it under the constitution for the purpose of electing a Senator. What is the Legislature of a State? Has Congress the power to declare what the Legislature shall consist of in a State, because of the fact that it has the right to prescribe the time and manner of electing Senators? In other words, can Congress decide that one branch only shall be consulted in the election? Surely not. That is not pretended.

In the latter part of the clause which I have read, it is provided that when the two Houses go into joint session, not a majority of a quorum to do business, but a majority of all the members elected shall be present. Thus it undertakes to prescribe what shall be a quorum of the Legislature. I apprehend that we have no authority to do that. All the authority we have on the subject is derived from the clause of the Constitution which empowers us to prescribe the time and manner (not the place) of choosing Senators. If we have a right to determine what shall be a quorum in the Legislature, we have the right to determine what the Legislature is, because the same clause that gives us the right to prescribe the time and manner also says that the Senator shall be elected by the Legislature. What is the Legislature, and who is to determine what the Legislature of a State is? Can Congress determine it? If Congress can determine it for the election of Senators, I do not see why it cannot for purposes of legislation. Is there any difference? The Legislature is the body that makes the laws, and the Constitution says that the same Legislature shall elect Senators. In any State one third of all the members elected to the Legislature may be declared a quorum to do business by its constitution; and yet here it is proposed to say that a majority of all the members elected must be present.

I do not think Congress has the right, in determining the manner of electing Senators, to go so far as to say what shall constitute a quorum of a State Legislature. There is the difficulty and the only difficulty I see in this bill. I think most clearly that that part of the bill ought to be stricken out, because if we can go to the extent of determining it we certainly can exercise a very dangerous power in determining what the Legislature of a State may be.

Mr. DAVIS. I understand the Senator from Missouri to assume that anybody that is competent to pass laws for a State may elect Senators.

Mr. HENDERSON. I do.

Mr. DAVIS. I think so clearly.

Mr. CLARK. I hope this amendment will not be agreed to. It was put in here for the purpose of securing a majority of all the persons elected to both Houses in case the Legislature came into convention, so that less than a majority should not be present at the meeting, or they should not elect when there was less than a majority present. I think it is a safe rule. There is a difference between the two Houses assembled in joint convention for the purpose of an election and the two Houses acting separately in their ordinary legislative capacity. It would be competent for them, undoubtedly, to prescribe their quorum in each House, but when they go into joint convention under the law of the United States for the purpose of electing a Senator, it seems to me entirely competent for the law of the United States to prescribe what shall be a quorum for that purpose.

Mr. HENDERSON. I should like to ask the Senator why he makes a difference in the election through the two branches and in joint session. Why is it that a New England State, which now elects under its constitution in the separate Houses, may prescribe that less than a majority of all elected shall constitute a quorum, and they may have a Senator here with less than a quorum, and we in the West, who prescribe a different mode, cannot? I should like to know the reason of the difference.

Mr. CLARK. We have prescribed no rule for New England and no rule for the West.

Mr. HENDERSON. I do not refer to New England particularly, because I do not know how they elect, but it is generally assumed that they elect separately there.

Mr. CLARK. When the Legislature undertakes to elect a Senator in the ordinary way of its transactions, that is, each House voting by itself, the bill does not propose to regulate what shall there be a quorum. The Legislature regulates that matter itself, or the State constitution regulates it. But when we provide that those two Houses may quit their ordinary method of legislation and go into joint assembly for the purpose of election, then we provide what shall be a quorum in that joint assembly, that there shall be at least secured a majority of the two Houses when they come to act together.

Mr. HENDERSON. Now, Mr. President, I submit to the Senate that if the constitution of the State of Missouri or the State of Ohio to-day determines that all the legislative business shall be done in joint session, and they see fit to adopt that plan, it is perfectly proper and constitutional, and we cannot interfere with it. All the legislative business of the State of Illinois to-day can be done in joint session of the Legislature, provided the State constitution so provides. If the people desire it they can do so. I do not see any reason in the world for prescribing a different rule for electing Senators through the two branches and in joint session. If the people of one State desire to elect in joint session, and they call that, by their constitution, a Legislature for the purpose, let it be governed by the same rules that govern in the other case; but do not declare what is to be a quorum in either case unless you do it in both. I hold that you have no right to do it in either.

The amendment was rejected—ayes ten, noes not counted.

The bill was reported to the Senate as amended and the amendments were concurred in.

Mr. WILLIAMS. I should like to ask a question with reference to the language used in the twenty-ninth line of the first section. It reads:

And the person having a majority of all the votes of the said joint assembly, a majority of all the members elected to both Houses being present and voting.

Is it intended by that phraseology to require a majority of each House, or a majority of both Houses?

Mr. CLARK. A majority of both present. There is to be a majority of the two, counting together as one body.

The bill was ordered to be engrossed for a third reading, and was read the third time.

Mr. SAULSBURY. I once heard an eminent physician say that the best thing to do with cucumbers was to dress them well with vinegar, pepper, salt, and mustard, and then throw them to the hogs. [Laughter.] I think the best thing to do with this bill is to indefinitely postpone it, and I therefore move that it be indefinitely postponed.

The motion was not agreed to.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The question is, Shall the bill pass?

Mr. SAULSBURY. On that question I call for the yeas and nays.

The yeas and nays were ordered; and being taken, resulted—yeas 25, nays 11; as follows:

YEAS—Messrs. Anthony, Clark, Conness, Cragin, Edmunds, Fessenden, Foster, Grimes, Harris, Howard, Howe, Johnson, Lane of Indiana, Morgan, Morrill, Nesmith, Nye, Poland, Pomeroy, Stewart, Sumner, Trumbull, Wade, Wiley, and Williams—25.

NAYS—Messrs. Cowan, Davis, Doolittle, Guthrie, Henderson, Norton, Kiddle, Saulsbury, Sherman, Sprague, and Van Winkle—11.

ABSENT—Messrs. Brown, Buckalew, Chandler, Creswell, Dixon, Hendricks, Kirkwood, Lane of Kansas, McDougall, Ramsey, Wilson, Wright, and Yates—13.

So the bill was passed.

MESSAGE FROM THE HOUSE.

A message from the House of Representatives, by Mr. McPHERSON, its Clerk, announced that the House of Representatives had passed without amendment the bill (S. No. 357) to aid in the construction of telegraph lines, and to secure to the Government the use of the same for postal, military, and other purposes.

The message further announced that the House of Representatives had agreed to the report of the committee of conference on the disagreeing votes of the two Houses on the amendments of the House to the bill (S. No. 145) for a grant of lands to the State of Kansas to aid in the construction of the Northern Kansas railroad and telegraph.

The message also announced that the House of Representatives had agreed to the amendment of the Senate to the bill (H. R. No. 456) to extend the benefits of section four of an act making appropriations for the support of the Army for the year ending June 30, 1866.

The message further announced that the House of Representatives had agreed to some and disagreed to other amendments of the Senate to the bill (H. R. No. 261) making appropriations for the consular and diplomatic expenses of the Government for the year ending 30th June, 1867, and for other purposes, asked a conference on the disagreeing votes of the two Houses thereon, and had appointed Mr. RUFUS P. SPALDING of Ohio, Mr. NATHANIEL P. BANKS of Massachusetts, and Mr. JOHN WENTWORTH of Illinois, managers at the same on its part.

The message further announced that the House of Representatives had passed a joint resolution (H. R. No. 187) recommending the organization and instruction of the militia by the several States, and providing for the distribution of ordnance and ordnance stores, in which it requested the concurrence of the Senate.

PREVENTION OF SMUGGLING.

Mr. CONNESS. I ask leave to present a report from the committee of conference on the bill (S. No. 222) further to prevent smuggling, and for other purposes. The report of the committee on this bill was presented once before, but there was some error found in it, owing to the fact that the whole of the amendments were not enumerated in the report. It is now correct, and accordingly I ask leave to present it, and I should like to have action upon it now.

The Secretary read the report, as follows:

The committee of conference on the disagreeing votes of the two Houses on the bill (S. No. 222) entitled "An act further to prevent smuggling, and for other purposes," having met, after full and free conference they have agreed to recommend, and do recommend, to their respective Houses as follows:

That the Senate agree to the first, second, third, fourth, sixth, seventh, eighth, ninth, tenth, eleventh, twelfth, thirteenth, fourteenth, and fifteenth amendments as the same were made by the House of Representatives.

That the Senate agree to the fifth amendment of the House of Representatives to the bill with the following amendment, to wit: insert in place of the words stricken out by the House of Representatives the words following: "in all cases where the possession of such goods shall be shown to be in the defendant, or where the defendant shall be shown to have had possession thereof, such possession shall be deemed evidence sufficient to authorize conviction, unless the defendant shall explain the possession to the satisfaction of the jury."

That the House of Representatives agree to the said amendment to the bill.

JOHN CONNESS,

LOT M. MORRILL,

Managers on the part of the Senate.

THOMAS D. ELIOT,

JOHN L. THOMAS,

Managers on the part of the House.

The report was concurred in.

ORPHANS' FAIR.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore laid before the Senate a communication from Mrs. J. C. Carlisle, secretary, inviting the members of the Senate to be present at the closing of the National Soldiers' and Sailors' Orphans' Fair on Thursday evening, the 12th instant.

ORDER OF BUSINESS.

Mr. WADE. I move now to postpone all other orders and proceed to the consideration of Senate bill No. 280, to repeal an act entitled "An act to retrocede the county of Alexandria, in the District of Columbia, to the State of Virginia," and for other purposes.

Mr. HENDERSON. The pending order of business is Senate bill No. 395, relating to the aqueduct bridge of the Alexandria Canal Company over the Potomac river at Georgetown, in the District of Columbia, which was informally passed over with a view of continuing the discussion upon and disposing of the bill in regard to the election of Senators. I had no idea at the time that that bill would take so long. This is a bill that I desire should at least be read; I wish that the Senate should become somewhat informed upon it; and I will say to the Senator from Ohio that then if there is any disposition to discuss the measure, inasmuch as he has had his bill up once before and I feel a delicacy in putting any obstacle in the way of it, I shall agree that it be laid over until to-morrow. I apprehend, however, that there will be no objection and no debate upon my bill, but that we can get through with it in a few moments. However, if opposition should develop itself, then I shall be willing to listen to a motion from the Senator to postpone it; but I prefer to have it read at least now. It is a bill that the Senator understands as well as myself.

Mr. WADE. I believe I understand that bill. I can really see no reason for reading it before we take up the Alexandria bill. That bill was discussed yesterday, and I gave away because it was said an executive session was desired; but after that was moved, or supposed to be moved, gentlemen got up other measures, and my colleague on the District Committee, the Senator from Missouri, moved, just as we went into executive session, to take up his bill after mine had been made the special order for to-day. It has been partly finished; it is in the minds of Senators now; they know precisely how the thing stands; and I think we had better proceed with and finish it. I wish to have a decision of the Senate upon it.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The question is on proceeding to the consideration of the bill named by the Senator from Ohio.

Mr. HOWE. I feel almost as if I was a little swindled myself. Yesterday I moved that the Senate proceed to the consideration of the bill for the construction of a canal around the falls of Niagara. It was then said that the Senator from Maine [Mr. MORRILL] desired to be present when that bill was considered, and that he might be present, I consented that the bill should lie over, and asked the Senate to make it the special order for to-day at one o'clock; but at the suggestion of gentlemen all about me, who said there would be no difficulty in taking it up at one o'clock to-day, I did not press that motion. There was no objection then, however, to its being considered at one o'clock to-day; but on the motion of the Senator from Ohio the bill to which he has just referred was then taken up, and I supposed it was the unfinished business; and understanding that the Senator wished to conclude that, I did not insist upon taking up the other bill; but I think now that the Senate ought really to conclude that bill, if he insists upon it, and then I think the bill which we consented yesterday should be taken up to-day at one o'clock ought to be proceeded with.

Mr. WADE. I am the friend of both these measures, both the ship-canal bill and the bill of the Senator from Missouri, but I think we had better finish this matter before we take up any other. We are too apt to mix things up, and I do not think we gain anything by doing it. We had better finish one thing at a time. I hope we shall take up this bill and finish it.

The PRESIDING OFFICER put the question on the motion of Mr. WADE and declared that the ayes appeared to prevail.

Mr. HENDERSON. Let us have a division. My bill is the pending measure as it is the unfinished business, and I shall never be able to get it up if it be put aside now. I only want to have it read. I want the Senate to become informed of the nature of the measure and understand what it is. The Senator from Wisconsin now says that as soon as the bill of the Senator from Ohio is disposed of he will move to take up the Niagara ship-canal bill. The truth is I have been trying for a week to get the floor, but I have been cut off on account of the absence of the Senator from Maine. I now ask that the bill be read, and then if the Senator from Ohio insists on going on with his Alexandria bill, which is also a bill from the Committee on the District of Columbia, I shall interpose no objection. I feel no further interest in it than that it has been placed in my charge.

Mr. WADE. If the Senator will let my bill be taken up, I will then let his bill be read.

Mr. HENDERSON. But that will displace my bill entirely; it will be no longer before the Senate, and the Senator from Wisconsin has given me notice that he will antagonize the ship-canal bill against it, as soon as the Senator's bill is disposed of. Now, as I have got the floor, as I have the privilege, as I have my measure before the Senate, I state to the Senator that if he will permit his bill to be passed over informally until this bill is read, I will suffer his bill to come up, but I do not want to lose my place before the Senate.

Mr. WADE. It is very strange to me that this antagonism should be made. The Senate most deliberately yesterday made the bill I have moved to take up the special order for one o'clock to-day.

Mr. HENDERSON. Move to pass over this bill informally.

Mr. WADE. Your bill is a very long one, I believe.

Mr. HENDERSON. No, sir; it is a very short one.

Mr. WADE. As the Senator only desires to have his bill read, I do not know but that I had better consent to have it read, rather than try a division.

Mr. HENDERSON. In order to settle the matter, as I do not wish to be pertinacious, if the Senator will move to pass over informally this bill, which is now regularly before the Senate as the unfinished business, I shall make no objection. But he makes a different motion; to postpone this measure and take up his.

Mr. WADE. If my measure is before the Senate, I am very willing that it shall lie over informally, to allow the Senator's bill to be read.

Mr. HENDERSON. It is not before the Senate.

Mr. WADE. I wish to have it brought before the Senate, and then I will consent to let your bill be read.

Mr. CLARK. The point is this: the Senator from Ohio makes a motion to postpone all prior orders, and that displaces entirely the Senator from Missouri. The Senator from Missouri says that if the Senator from Ohio will let the unfinished business be laid aside informally, so as not to displace him, he will allow this bill to come up. I think the Senator from Ohio had better do that, if the rest of the Senate do not object.

Mr. WADE. I have no objection. Any way to get along the easiest is my way, of course.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The unfinished business can be laid aside by unanimous consent.

Mr. WADE. Then let us take up my bill and go on with it.

Mr. CLARK. Your bill is before the Senate if that unanimous consent is given.

Mr. WADE. If my bill is before the Senate that is all I want.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Chair understands there is no objection, and therefore the bill moved by the Senator from Ohio is before the Senate.

RETROCESSION OF ALEXANDRIA.

The Senate resumed the consideration of the bill (S. No. 280) to repeal an act entitled "An act to retrocede the county of Alexandria, in the District of Columbia, to the State of Virginia," and for other purposes.

Mr. CLARK. As I have been unable to bring my mind and judgment to the same conclusion with the Senator from Ohio, that it is best to pass the bill now before the Senate, and as he has declared that the retrocession of Alexandria to Virginia was a secession measure, I feel impelled to give the reasons which will induce me to vote against the repeal of that measure which he calls a secession measure. I do not like to be found voting with the rebels nor with any plan of the rebels; and if I believed that that was a part of the scheme of the rebellion, carried to the end for that purpose, I might perhaps vote for the repeal under ordinary circumstances.

Mr. WADE. Right here, if the Senator will permit me, I should like to say a word.

Mr. CLARK. Certainly.

Mr. WADE. I did say that in my judgment the measure was moved originally by those intending rebellion. I did not suppose that the great numbers of those who voted for it had any such idea. It was, in my judgment, only some of those Virginia gentlemen who moved it here who had such motives; but that I only guessed at. I did not lay it down as a fact that it was so, and most assuredly did not intend to reflect upon anybody who had voted for the measure without any such idea.

Mr. CLARK. I supposed it would come to that, that it was guess-work.

Mr. WADE. That part of it.

Mr. CLARK. Or perhaps an ad captandum speech for carrying the present measure, because when I come to refer to the record in the House of Representatives of those who voted for it, I find such names as Douglas, of Illinois; Foot, of Vermont; Ingersoll, of Pennsylvania; Andrew Johnson, now President; Marsh, of Vermont; Ramsey, of Minnesota; Rockwell, of Massachusetts; Schenck, of Ohio; Truman Smith, of Connecticut; Caleb B. Smith, of Indiana; Vinton, of Ohio; and Winthrop, of Massachusetts. And when I turn to the Senate I find Cameron, of Pennsylvania; Cilley, of New Hampshire; John M. Clayton, of Delaware; Corwin, of Ohio; Crittenden, of Kentucky; Davis, of Massachusetts; Dayton, of New Jersey; Johnson, of Maryland; and Simmons, of Rhode Island. I could not well perceive, myself, that they had got into any scheme of rebellion.

But, Mr. President, laying aside that view of the case, I have not been able, as I say, to come to the same conclusion with the Senator from Ohio, because it seems to me that it would only increase the difficulty under which we now labor. Either the act of 1846 was constitutional or it was unconstitutional. If it was a constitutional act, and reconveyed that territory to the State of Virginia, that was a cession with which we have now nothing to do. We cannot recall it. It was an act done, and the territory passed under their jurisdiction. If it was an unconstitutional act, it is a question for the courts to decide. Congress when it passed it undoubtedly thought it was constitutional. I do not think it is quite the prerogative of this Congress to judge of the act of another Congress and say it was unconstitutional, and therefore repeal it on that ground, but to leave it to the court to say whether it was constitutional or not; especially when if you attempt to repeal it you only increase the difficulty under which you now labor. You passed the act of 1846, and by that act, constitutional or not, you actually transferred all that territory to the jurisdiction of Virginia. It has been ever since within the jurisdiction of Virginia for twenty years. The people there have acknowledged the laws of Virginia, by your act, by your direction, by your cession.

Now, it seems to me hardly right for the Congress of the United States to repeal that act. I believe they will increase the difficulty by saying "we will repeal that act; we will resume the jurisdiction which we granted away," thus producing a conflict between the two jurisdictions—the State of Virginia and the District of Columbia. I think it is far better for the peace of the country, for the safety of the country, for the quiet of the neighborhood; I mean to let that territory remain under the jurisdiction of Virginia until the question can be tried by the courts. If the courts decide the law to be unconstitutional, then the whole jurisdiction must revert to the District of Columbia. If it is decided to be constitutional, we have no power over it; and if you repeal the act, it must remain as it was. You do not escape the difficulty by the repeal of the act. There may be persons within that district who will say, "this Territory passed to the State of Virginia by the act of 1846; it was an act done, and the cession was complete; you cannot recall it; we do not acknowledge the right of the District of Columbia over us; we prefer the jurisdiction of the State of Virginia;" and they appeal to the courts, and the courts decide that that first act was constitutional; what then? It must remain there; the repeal cannot alter it; so that, in either case, you do not escape the difficulty. You only make matters worse, it seems to me. I prefer that the matter should remain as it is, so far as I am concerned, until it is decided by the proper tribunal, to wit: a court of the United States.

Mr. DAVIS. I wish to say one word on this subject. I myself never heard of any movement or intention of secession as connected with the retrocession of Alexandria to Virginia. I voted against it, and Jefferson Davis voted against it at the same time. There was about as much blending of votes that had a tendency and an anti-tendency to secession on that subject as could occur upon almost any other subject whatever.

The first movement, as I learn from a respected friend who is a citizen of this District, for the retrocession of Alexandria was made about the year 1820. The considerations upon which that movement was made were about these: there was one system of civil law for that portion of the District northeast of the Potomac, and there was a different system of law for that portion of it that was subsequently ceded to Virginia, southwest of the Potomac. There were three judges of the District court, and all resided either in Washington city or Georgetown. There was no judge resident on the other side of the Potomac, and when men had business, either as lawyers or as parties to suits, and wanted to get a writ of injunction or any other restraining order, they had to come up from Alexandria to Washington city in order to get the order of the proper judicial officer. This friend of mine informed me that the movement was made very earnestly at that time, and with the full sanction of all the people of Alexandria; and to operate upon the sentiment of the people of Alexandria in favor of the retrocession, some industrious lawyer or gentleman compiled all the appropriations of money by the Congress of the United States to the different portions of the District. There had been millions appropriated to that portion of the District on this side, and on the other side there was but a solitary appropriation, and that was to build a jail.

To alleviate this inconvenience in some respect an act of Congress was passed requiring that one judge of the District court of the District of Columbia should reside in Alexandria; but before that law was observed so as to induce one of the judges to remove his residence to that city, or to procure the appointment of a judge resident in that city, the law was repealed. I have understood from this respected friend of mine that at various times, two or three times at least, after the year 1820 and previous to the year 1846, there was a similar movement of the people of Alexandria to have a retrocession of the portion of the District that had been ceded by Virginia, and never in connection with secession or with any political object whatever, but simply to detach that portion of the District from the government of Congress, and to throw it back to the government of Virginia.

I make these statements of facts for the purpose of vindicating this act of retrocession from every imputation connected with secessionism or any other form of disloyalty to the Government of the United States; and having done this much I will take my seat.

Mr. JOHNSON. Mr. President, the more I think of the effect of the bill now before us the more I am persuaded that it will be attended with mischievous results. It is now twenty years since that part of the District was ceded back to Virginia. Virginia accepted it, and the people of the district ceded acquiesced in it. If I can get the attention of the honorable member from Ohio who has charge of this bill, perhaps I can persuade him that he will do more harm than good by passing this bill.

Before 1846, before this law was passed, the jurisdiction of the courts of the District extended over this portion of the ten miles square. When the retrocession was made in 1846 there were pending in the Supreme Court of the United States a variety of cases that had been carried by writ of error or appeal from the court in Alexandria to the Supreme Court. The act of 1846 made no provision for such cases. There was nothing in that act which took from the Supreme Court the jurisdiction which they antecedently had. But the practical difficulty was that they could not send their mandates down after the cases were disposed of to the United States court in Alexandria from which they came. It was impossible, therefore, to decide those cases beneficially, and there they must remain. Congress, looking to that state of things, on the 5th of July, 1848, passed another act authorizing the Supreme Court of the United States, when they should decide the cases then on appeal before that tribunal from the county of Alexandria, to transmit the mandates to the proper court of the State of Virginia; and it was not questioned in 1848 that Congress had authority to make that provision. The first case, and the only case so far as I am advised that is reported, that was sent by the Supreme Court of the United States to the court of Virginia under the authority of the act of Congress of July 5, 1848, was argued in that court, among others, by the late Henry Winter Davis, of whose capacity it is unnecessary to speak in this presence, and especially in the presence of the honorable member from Ohio. I think he held him as high as most people, and most people held him very high. He was eminent as a lawyer as well as a politician, and in my judgment more often wrong in the latter capacity than he was in the first. The Virginia court, in deciding the case that came before them under the authority of the act of July, 1848, used these words:

"It is admitted on all hands that Congress had the constitutional power of retroceding and Virginia of accepting the retrocession of territory ceded by the latter to the former as above mentioned."

Mr. Davis's interest, or rather the interest of his client, would have been to deny the validity of the retrocession act of 1846. The case before the court of Virginia involved that question, it was a preliminary question to their decision, and yet, as you see, they state that it was a concession on the part of all counselors, as well as judges, that the act of 1846 was constitutional, or, to repeat their language:

"It is admitted on all hands that Congress had the constitutional power of retroceding and Virginia of accepting the retrocession of territory ceded by the latter to the former as above mentioned."

Mr. FESSENDEN. What case is that?

Mr. JOHNSON. The decision of the supreme court of Virginia upon a case which, at the time of the retrocession, was before the Supreme Court of the United States upon a writ of error from the United States court in Alexandria, and which they were afterward directed to send to the supreme court of Virginia when they should have decided it. From that day to this the validity of that act never has been questioned. But the effect of the act of 1848, if the Senate will recur to that, is to repeal all the laws by which, as far as the United States were concerned, that portion of the District was governed under the authority of the United States. They have no laws there now except such laws as Virginia, through its Legislature, has adopted. Then, if you pass this act and make no other provision, you will have that part of the District without any laws at all regulating their courts.

Mr. FESSENDEN. They have the old laws.

Mr. JOHNSON. The old laws were the laws of Virginia, but they would not come in force because they are all repealed, unless we shall pass a law reviving them. All their conveyances, all their contracts that required recording, all their marriages, everything that was regulated by law before, since the retrocession of the District have been regulated by the laws of Virginia; and, if we shall determine that the act of 1846 was not constitutional, all those marriage and other contracts which have not been perfected in the manner pointed out by the laws in force at the time of the retrocession, but have been regulated by the laws of Virginia, will be void.

Another objection was taken and urged yesterday with some force, that the act of 1846 was unconstitutional because it was made to depend upon the vote of the people of Alexandria as well as upon the consent of the Legislature of Virginia. I have but a word to add on that subject. This is not an act of legislation at all in that sense. The United States became the owners of this property as one contracting party. The land originally belonged to Virginia. The United States had no authority to become the owner of it without the consent of Virginia. It was therefore a contract as between the United States upon the one hand, and the State of Virginia upon the other, by which the United States became the owner of this property. The United States had no authority to become the owner of it by force of legislation. The form of legislation was adopted because the Congress of the United States cannot contract in any other form; but although the form was that of a legislative act, yet, what was done by virtue of that act, and by virtue of the subsequent assent on the part of Virginia, was neither more nor less than a contract, which either party, with the consent of the other, had a right to modify at any time. I suppose that to be very clear.

The honorable member from Nevada [Mr. STEWART] supposes that a case referred to in one of Selden's Reports, I forget the volume, bears upon this question. I have not looked at that case; I have had no opportunity of doing it. I prefer to stand upon the authority of the Supreme Court of the United States. They have decided cases of this description, and nobody in that court ever dreamed of denying the validity of a contract which was entered into under the circumstances which I am about to state. In the construction of the many railways that are now passing through the West the charters granted by the State to those railways gave authority to the cities and the towns and the boroughs through which a road was to pass to subscribe for stock in the road, provided a majority of the people of such towns or cities or boroughs voted in favor of the subscription. That was done in a variety of cases. The first case that came before the Supreme Court of the United States, or the first that I recollect—the subsequent cases I argued—was the case of Aspinwall vs. The Commissioners of the County of Davis, a county in Indiana, I think. The language of the charter of that case was:

"Provided, That if a majority of the votes given shall be in favor of subscription the county board of said county shall subscribe, and not otherwise."

So that the operation of that charter in that particular was made to depend upon the approval or disapproval of the people who were to be affected by it; and nobody dreamed of denying that if the majority of the people decided against a subscription there would be no authority in the county to subscribe, or if they decided in favor of a subscription, that it was not within the authority of the county to subscribe, and that the subscription would not be valid. That was done in this instance. A majority did decide in favor of subscribing, and a subscription was made and they issued their bonds. They afterward determined that they would not pay, first, because some formality had not been observed, and secondly, because they had been cheated. The Supreme Court decided that the issuing of the bonds with the knowledge of the county, coupled with the fact that the subscription had been made for the payment of which the bonds were issued, was conclusive evidence of the validity of the subscription, because it was conclusive evidence that a majority of the people had decided that there should be such a subscription. There are twenty cases since going to the same effect.

There are other difficulties in this case, and I want my friends from West Virginia to consider them, if their minds are not made up. What is the present Legislature of Virginia? How was it elected? Elected in part by the people of this very territory. Where did the convention meet that determined there should be elections? Within the limits of this very territory. How was the assent to the creation of West Virginia granted?

Mr. WILLEY. By the Legislature of Virginia at the city of Wheeling.

Mr. JOHNSON. Very well. How was it chosen? Were there not members from Alexandria?

Mr. WILLEY. Yes, sir.

Mr. JOHNSON. That is what I mean. It is perfectly immaterial where they sat. A portion of that Legislature was chosen by the people of Alexandria, and nobody dreamed at that time that that portion of what originally was Virginia was not as much Virginia as the portion in which the town of Wheeling was situated. We have ever since, by act after act and by judicial action, recognized the validity of the act of 1846, by considering what is now Virginia as made up in part of the county of Alexandria. I do not know what the vote was; I do not know how many members composed the Legislature of Virginia at the time the assent was given to the creation of West Virginia. They were but very few. There were only five or six counties, I think.

Mr. WILLEY. There were some forty members.

Mr. JOHNSON. Where were they from?

Mr. WILLEY. From West Virginia principally.

Mr. JOHNSON. But not from the eastern portion of Virginia. Very few of them were from the eastern portion of Virginia. West Virginia of course was for it, but West Virginia had no right to represent East Virginia as Virginia then stood, and the only Representatives of the State of Virginia at the time that assent was given were, I believe, nearly all from this portion of the country, from this very town of Alexandria; and that Legislature has now chosen Senators. You have not received them, but they have not been refused admission upon the ground that Alexandria county was not a part of Virginia, but, on the contrary, was a part of the District of Columbia; but upon other grounds equally applicable to all the other States in the Union who are not now represented as well as to East Virginia or Virginia proper.

Now, suppose you decide—as you do by the passage of this bill, provided you have the right to decide it—that the act of 1846 was void, what may be the consequence upon West Virginia? What may be the effect upon your legislation since? What may be the effect upon titles to real and personal property which have come into existence by contracts since 1846, contracts authorized and only authorized by the laws of Virginia? You multiply all kinds of difficulties. Why should you? Why should it be done? As I said yesterday, we do not want that two or three miles of territory to protect us. Who asks for it? I do not know. I have not seen the application. I know there are more than a thousand names here against it. When the act of 1846 was passed, upon that act being submitted to the approval or disapproval of the then voters of that portion of the ten miles square, and the polls being kept open for two days, the vote for retrocession was 763, the vote against it was 222; making of course a majority in favor of it of 541 out of a total of 985, nearly four to one. Now, what has produced the change? I do not know. Who asks for the change? I am equally ignorant. I assume, because I believe it to be true, that they are all new comers comparatively, who would prefer being under the Government of the United States. Whether that is a wise preference or not is another matter; but is it fair, is it just, when by your legislation you submitted it to the people in 1846, and they decided in favor of retrocession, and they have acted on the faith of the validity of that retrocession, that you should now, at the end of twenty years, undo all that you have done?

But that is not all. Will you not increase the expenses of the Government? How many more courts must you have? How many more officers must you have? How many additional judges, probate judges, and judges of other descriptions, recorders of deeds, marshals, clerks of courts? And what is it to cost? You will give, I suppose, the same compensation you give here; and then it will be seen probably that a good many of the persons who are now asking for this act of retrocession will become applicants for offices. That I can understand.

But there is another objection. It is a solecism; it is contrary to the very spirit of our institutions that persons should be legislated about in their persons and their property without representation. The exception of the ten miles square was made because of considerations tantamount in importance, as it was supposed, to those which established in a free Government representation and taxation as going together. Now, what are you about to do? You want to extend the franchise, many of you, to the black man, who has just been emancipated. Why? Because it is necessary to his protection, necessary to the full enjoyment of his freedom. Now, you are about to bring back into the District some fifteen hundred or two thousand people, a large majority of whom are protesting against it, when by bringing them back you subject them to taxation without representation and to just as much taxation as you may think proper to impose.

I am far from saying that the provision in the Constitution was not a very advisable one and an absolutely necessary one, which gives Congress the exclusive right of legislating for the seat of Government; but I submit it, as due to principle, that if you have enough territory to answer all the purposes of a seat of Government, it is wrong in principle to seek to get more, when by getting more (and you can only get more by coming to that result) you deprive the people who are now represented in Virginia of the right of representation, and subject them to taxation without representation—not even entitled to a Delegate on the floor of the House—slaves, in one sense, as far as slavery exists because of the absence of the right of representation, and made slaves in that sense only because the Convention deemed it necessary in order to secure the councils of the nation from improper interruption and from State control. But we are in that condition now. The provision, as the Senate know, was that the District should not exceed ten miles square. Congress might have taken as much less as they thought proper. They might have taken this side of the Potomac at the beginning, and then this difficulty could not have arisen; but the argument is, that because they took more than has been found necessary or expedient by actual experience and practice, they have no right to get clear of any part of it, and that notwithstanding they have remained undisturbed and without anybody questioning the security of the Government while in the possession only of that part of the original ten miles square which is found on this side of the Potomac.

Mr. HOWARD. Mr. President, when this bill was before us yesterday I took occasion to state to the Senate very briefly my reasons for holding that the act of 1846 was unconstitutional, and that it was incompetent for Congress to retrocede any portion of the District of Columbia either to Virginia or Maryland. I have listened, as I always do, with great interest to the arguments of the learned Senator from Maryland, taking a contrary view and coming to an opposite conclusion. I propose to say a word in reply to what I regard as the main point of his argument.

He says that by the first clause of the provision of the Constitution authorizing Congress to exercise exclusive legislation, &c., over the District of Columbia, Congress merely acquired the right of exclusive legislation, and that that was the great object of the clause; but that the latter clause of the same provision, giving the United States a right to acquire lands in States for the purpose of dock-yards, arsenals, &c., plainly, in his judgment, recognizes the right of Congress to transfer those places or to retrocede them to the States in which they may happen to lie, and that if Congress may retrocede a dock-yard or an arsenal ergo it may retrocede a part or the whole of the District of Columbia. With great respect to the logical powers of the Senator from Maryland I regard this as a non sequitur. It may be that Congress has power to retrocede dock-yards, arsenals, &c., or even to sell them to individuals, and still be divested of the power to retrocede the District of Columbia; and I insist that such is the fair construction of the provision. How does the District of Columbia become the seat of Government of the United States, and how do dock-yards, &c., become the property of the United States? The clause is very carefully drawn. It says:

"The Congress shall have power to exercise exclusive legislation in all cases whatsoever over such district (not exceeding ten miles square) as may, by cession of particular States, and the acceptance of Congress, become the seat of the Government of the United States."

Now, sir, look at this language. By what means is it that the District becomes the seat of Government of the United States? Not by purchase, for the language does not contemplate a purchase; but by a voluntary cession of the States concerned, and by an acceptance of the cession by Congress. When these two events concur—the cession by the States and the acceptance by Congress—then, in the language of the Constitution, the tract so ceded and accepted "becomes the seat of the Government of the United States;" and the language itself implies that this seat of Government shall continue to be the permanent seat of the Government. Certainly the learned Senator will not contend that although Congress has accepted a cession from Virginia and Maryland of the District of Columbia, it may proceed and establish another and a second seat of Government. And why not? Because the language of the Constitution declares that this District has become, by those two concurrent acts, the seat of Government of the United States, and excludes the idea that any other portion of the United States can assume the same character and quality. It follows very clearly from this language of the first clause that it was the intention of the framers of the Constitution, and of the people who ratified it, that the seat of Government should be permanently fixed in the district which might be so ceded and accepted; and such has ever been the light in which it has been viewed. The earliest statute of the United States on this subject, passed as early as 1791, speaks of the acquisition as being the permanent seat of Government; and General Washington in his proclamation uses the same language; and indeed the clause is capable of no other construction or interpretation but that this District thus acquired is to be forever the seat of Government. It is, in short, as permanent, as enduring as the Constitution itself which has created it the seat of Government.

Mr. DOOLITTLE. Do I understand the honorable Senator to maintain that we cannot change the seat of Government without changing the Constitution?

Mr. HOWARD. Yes, sir. I stated that yesterday; and that is the conclusion I draw, and which flows inevitably from the premises I assume. It is fixed here in permanency because the Constitution fixes it here.

Mr. JOHNSON. Is the honorable member under the impression that the Constitution says it is to be the permanent seat of Government?

Mr. HOWARD. I do not say that such is the express language, but that such is the inevitable inference from the language. How can it be otherwise? Congress "shall exercise exclusive jurisdiction in all cases over such district as may"—how? "By cession of particular States and acceptance of Congress become the seat of the Government." It is the cession and the acceptance that constitute it the seat of Government, and the cession and the acceptance both depend upon the Constitution which imparts to Congress the right and the power to perform those two acts, and it is, in its very nature, as permanent as the clause itself under which the power is claimed.

This is not true of the second clause of the same provision declaring that Congress shall have power "to exercise like authority over all places purchased by the consent of the Legislature of the State in which the same may be for the erection of forts, magazines, arsenals, dock-yards, and other needful buildings." All the power that is here given to Congress is the right to purchase, not to accept a cession merely as a cession, which implies in itself both the right of soil, if the party ceding possesses the right of soil, as well as of jurisdiction. Under this latter clause Congress can only purchase the lands of private individuals for the purpose of establishing forts, &c. That is the plain effect of the terms. Congress purchases of individuals private lands for the purpose of establishing dock-yards, &c., and when this purchase has been made with the consent of the States, but not until then, the right of exclusive jurisdiction on the part of the Government accrues. Congress may undoubtedly purchase of individuals lands for these purposes lying within the limits of a State; but it does not get the right of exclusive jurisdiction over them until the assent of the Legislature of the State has been given to the grant; and this principle has been held by the courts in repeated instances; so that the title itself which the Government gets in the latter case differs essentially from that which it obtains in the former case. In the former case it takes the title in trust for a specific purpose; that is, to hold the land as the seat of Government permanently, according to the Constitution; in the latter case it becomes merely a purchaser, and may, I should suppose, cede it or grant it away to any person that may consent to become the purchaser or grantee. I see no difficulty in that. But because it may grant away dock-yards and arsenals, it by no means follows that it can grant away the seat of Government, which, by the Constitution, properly interpreted, is to be permanent and enduring.

I see no force, therefore, in the somewhat plausible argument of my learned friend from Maryland. We must construe this article as it is written, and construe it with reference to the events transpiring at the time and the occasion which produced it, and endeavor to elicit the intention both from the text itself and from the historical events by which the Convention was actuated. Sir, can we violate a trust? Is it competent for Congress under the Constitution, having such a trust imposed upon them and having accepted it, to violate and disown it? It may be said that with the consent of the cestuis que trust, that is, of Maryland and Virginia, the ceding parties, Congress may grant away the District. That argument has no force. Who were the parties in interest? Who were the cestuis que trust, the beneficiaries, under the Constitution? Were Maryland and Virginia, or the people of those two States, the only beneficiaries interested in it? No, sir; the whole people of the United States were the parties interested, one State as well as another, one citizen as well as another; and I contend it is not in the power of Congress to divest themselves of this trust without the consent of the whole people of the United States, who, and who alone, are the parties interested as cestuis que trust, without an amendment of this clause giving the power. I hold, therefore, that the act of retrocession to Virginia of 1846 was absolutely void, as a violation of the trust imposed by the Constitution, and it is time for us to resume the jurisdiction.

The Senator from New Hampshire tells us that he declines to vote in the interest of the rebellion; and to show that the act of 1846 was not passed in the interest of the prospective rebellion he reads from the record the names of various northern Senators and Representatives who voted for it. It is not at all surprising that northern gentlemen should have voted for the act of retrocession. No man need be astonished at it. It is some relief to me, and it ought to be some relief to the honorable Senator from New Hampshire, to know that the fugitive slave act of 1850, passed only four years after this retrocession, and which no man will deny was in the minds of the leading secessionists an initiatory measure to the rebellion, which no man will deny was intended to fire the southern heart, and, in the language of Mr. Calhoun's letter of 1847, intended "to force the issue upon the North," was approved by a northern Chief Magistrate no less conservative than Millard Fillmore. Certainly, Mr. Fillmore did not intend that as a measure initiatory to a general rebellion or that it would become such; that probably was farthest from his thoughts; but still at this day, I take it, no man will deny that such was the real purpose of that wicked measure. It was drawn by James M. Mason, submitted to this body by him, was engineered through the Senate by his persuasion. What his object really was, is best determined by looking at the history of that individual from that time down to the present moment. He became a rebel and is now an outlaw, not daring to show his face in the country that gave him birth.

Mr. SAULSBURY. I wish to ask the honorable Senator to be good enough to explain to the Senate, because I ask for information, how it is possible that the enactment of a fugitive slave law could contribute to bringing about a rebellion in this country on the part of the southern States, who would be benefited by the enactment?

Mr. HOWARD. The question of the honorable Senator opens a very wide field for discussion, and involves the recital of numerous historical events of which he is as well aware, I take it, as I am. I will not, therefore, consume the time of the Senate in answering his question further than to say that in my opinion—and that opinion is borne out by the history of the times—the fugitive slave law of 1850 was enacted by that Congress, under the engineering of Mr. Mason and others, for the very purpose of insulting the northern mind, of insulting the citizens of the free States, by attempting to make every man of them a slave-catcher at the beck of a southern master in pursuit of his slave. Common sense would have taught the authors of that law that it could possibly lead to no good, that it could have no other effect but to irritate and excite the northern people on the subject of slavery, and make it still more difficult to bring about a settlement of the controversies which were then raging throughout the country. It was intended as an insult; it was intended to produce such a state of feeling, both at the North and South, as should, within the shortest possible time, eventuate in a bloody conflict between the two sections; and it contributed, in my judgment, (and I have been a careful observer of passing events,) more than any other act passed by Congress, or any other cause, to produce the civil war. It was intended as a means of initiating secession and dissolution.

Mr. SAULSBURY. It is not my intention to detain the Senate; I spoke longer on this subject yesterday than I intended; but there is one view in which this subject may be considered which then escaped my memory, which I wish to mention to the Senate, and I will simply state it now.

If this were a controversy between private individuals, instead of between the Government of the United States and the State of Virginia, there can be no doubt as to how it would be decided in a court of law. I contended yesterday that the act of retrocession of this portion of the District of Columbia to the State of Virginia was not unconstitutional, but was constitutional; but even if we were to admit, for the sake of the argument, that the original act of retrocession was unconstitutional, yet at this late day it would not be competent for the Congress of the United States to repeal the act, provided the same rules of law and principles of equity would obtain in a controversy between the State of Virginia and the United States as would obtain between private individuals. There is no principle of law more clearly recognized than this, that where a party claiming an interest, for instance, in a tract of land, attends a public sale, sees that tract of land sold to an innocent purchaser for a valuable consideration, sees improvements erected upon that tract of land, and folds his arms and acquiesces in it, the party who has the legal title to the land by his acts has forfeited that title and cannot recover the land as against an innocent purchaser.

Now, what is the application of this principle of law to the present case? In 1846 the Congress of the United States by solemn act retroceded this portion of the District of Columbia to the State of Virginia. For twenty years the United States Government has acquiesced in that act. By many subsequent acts of legislation she has recognized this former portion of the District of Columbia to be a portion of Virginia. She has levied direct taxes upon the inhabitants of Alexandria as inhabitants of the State of Virginia. She has stood by and seen the State of Virginia erecting at the public expense and out of the public treasury of that State three railroads in that territory. She has admitted to seats in the House of Representatives of the United States, Representatives elected by the inhabitants of that portion of a congressional district of Virginia. She applied her confiscation act to the inhabitants of that former portion of the District of Columbia as citizens of the State of Virginia. The Congress of the United States, in levying its direct tax, provided that in case of non-payment of that tax by these very people, inhabitants of Virginia, they should be subjected to an additional penalty of fifty per cent.

Mr. JOHNSON. And appointed collectors and assessors under the revenue act.

Mr. SAULSBURY. And appointed collectors who are residing in Virginia. In every form, in every shape, in which Congress could recognize Alexandria as being in the State of Virginia, it has done so from the year 1846 when it passed the act of retrocession. And yet, in the face of all the solemn acts of the Government of the United States in every department, executive, legislative, and judicial, and that continuously for a period of twenty years, you are now asked to repeal the law and to say that Alexandria is no portion of the State of Virginia. Why, sir, if this was a controversy between individuals in a court of law or in a court of equity, upon the mere presentation of the facts to the court they would not hear argument on the subject. They would say you are estopped in law or you are estopped in pais; your own acts conclude you. Sir, you cannot blow hot and cold at the same time. You have made your election, and even if the original act was absolutely void, your subsequent acts rendered the retrocession valid and complete. There is no lawyer that has ever studied an elementary book upon the principles of the law that can gainsay or deny the correctness of the opinion I have now passed.

Mr. President, let not prejudice or passion warp our judgments as legislators. When the principle governing the case is as clear as the sun at noonday, do not let us fly in the face of reason and of law and say, simply because we have numbers sufficient to pass the act that therefore, right or wrong, legal or illegal, we will pass it. There is not a member of the legal profession on this floor who, if this was a controversy between private individuals, and the plaintiff in the case was standing in the same attitude toward the defendant that the United States stands in reference to the State of Virginia, would take a fee to go into a courthouse to argue the case. And yet, sir, because it is Virginia, which is in ruins, and because the United States Government is a great and powerful Government, and because there is a disapproval of the action of the public men of Virginia in attempting to secede from the Federal Union, we are asked to pass this bill directly in the face of our own action for twenty years, directly in contravention of the plainest and simplest principles of law, and directly and palpably in contravention of the plainest principles of justice. Seize upon that portion of what was formerly the District of Columbia, appropriate to yourselves the money of Virginia that has been expended in the erection of railroads and other improvements in that district, and then lay your hands upon your hearts and say that this is all just and fair!

But, Mr. President, I was struck with a remark that fell from the honorable Senator from Ohio the other day. He went further, and contended, if I understood him aright, and I do not wish to misrepresent him, that even if the law of retrocession was constitutional, yet that the Congress of the United States had the power, and, as I understood him, could rightfully repeal the act.

Mr. WADE. Certainly.

Mr. SAULSBURY. The Senator nods assent.

Mr. WADE. I will tell you why when you get through.

Mr. SAULSBURY. I shall be glad to hear the "why." Let me put a case. In most of the States of this Union there are what are called vacant lands, the title to which is in the State. There has been a great deal of that kind of land in my State. We have a law, as I presume most States have for their vacant lands, that gives the privilege to any person who knows where there is vacant land to petition the Legislature of the State for a grant of the land; and the Legislature may grant for a consideration, or they may grant it without any consideration. Suppose now that the Legislature of a State where there are vacant lands located, does by solemn act of the Legislature grant to A B five hundred acres of vacant land situated in such a hundred or such a township. That, then, is the law of the land. Suppose A B goes into possession of that land, ditches it, makes improvements upon it, will the honorable Senator say that it would be competent for the Legislature of that State to repeal that act and divest the title granted? It is a contract, as most of the law is resolved into contract; it is a contract between the State and the individual.

When the grant is made by the State and accepted by the individual the contract is perfected, and it is not in the power of the grantor to divest the grantee of the title. So in this case, if the right to that portion of the District of Columbia was in the United States, and Congress had the power to part with it—and I shall not discuss that aspect of the question, because it has been already exhausted by the Senator from Maryland—when the Government of the United States, acting through its legislative department, made a grant of that portion of the District to the State of Virginia, and that grant was accepted by the State of Virginia and she went into possession, it became a contract executed, which no one of the parties has the right, without the consent of the other, to revoke. A contrary doctrine would lead to the most disastrous consequences in every State of this Union. What! make a solemn grant, part with your title by the most solemn mode in which you can part with it—because the most solemn and formal way in which the Government of the United States can part with title to property is by an act of the Congress of the United States—part with your title, vest it in A B, see him go on, and after he has accepted the grant improve the subject-matter of it, and then turn around and say you have a right to divest it! Why, sir, this principle, if applied practically, would destroy an amount of title to real estate in this country, destroy an amount of property valued at millions and untold millions; and it is the first time in my life I ever heard the doctrine advanced. It is not in any book, not even, as an eminent lawyer of my State once said, "in 17 Dogberry, bound in boards." There cannot be found such a principle in any law book, not even in the old black-letter law books, nor in any law book in any State in this Union, or in any court where English law is administered. Such a principle is totally subversive of the law which governs titles to estates.

Mr. President, some of us supposed before now that we knew a little about law; but if these principles be correct, then I apprehend that nineteen twentieths and ninety-nine out of every hundred lawyers will have to go back to the A B C of the law, and see if they cannot dig up some hidden meaning which has escaped the observation of all those who have essayed the paths of the law heretofore.

Mr. President, I have said all I have to say on this subject, and will now hear the reasons which the honorable Senator can assign wherein, if the act of retrocession be constitutional, Congress gets the power to repeal it.

Mr. WADE. I am in hopes I shall convince the gentleman, loath as I see he is to be convinced of anything against his side of the question. I do not propose to go over the arguments I have made on this subject twice before with regard to the constitutionality of the act of 1846 upon general principles of law on which I sought first to place it. I believe they stand firm yet against all the arguments that have been made. I have heard nothing to shake my confidence in the position that was assumed by the Senator from New York, [Mr. HARRIS,] the Senator from Nevada, [Mr. STEWART,] and the Senator from Michigan, [Mr. HOWARD,] and therefore it is unnecessary for me to undertake to reinforce their arguments by anything that I can say upon the general subject. But the Senator from Delaware wishes to know, on the supposition that their arguments are unsound and that the original act was constitutional, how it is that Congress has power now to repeal the act and to bring back those people into the District of Columbia again. I am astonished that he did not see that there was a principle of law that would sweep away all this stuff we have been talking about and put it clearly within the power of Congress to place this part of the District wherever they pleased, and that, too, upon principles of the highest public law.

Suppose that in 1846—for I am only making the supposition—the arguments of the gentlemen that go against me upon this question were all right, and that the law was strictly constitutional then, that all parties concurred in it, and that Congress had a right to undo what they had done at the origin of the Government, as I do not admit, however, does the gentleman forget the principle of law that where there are compacts between different nations and war breaks out between them the compacts are all annulled? Did you ever hear of such a law? Did you not know that your act of rebellion in the State of old Virginia put it in our power, at our will, to annul everything we had done, even if it had been constitutional at the time? Can you deny that there is such a principle of law as that? Do you want me to go to the books and look up authorities to show that the breaking out of a war between nations annuls every compact and places the parties, as it were, in a state of nature, clear from anything, putting an end to all compacts or agreements that have been entered into? It is in this way, sir, that I answer you, even if your arguments were just and your logic true, it is notwithstanding in our power, nay, sir, it is our highest duty that we owe to the loyal people of that district, to place them back where they were before.

If this compact was made with the State of Virginia in 1846, was it not made upon the hypothesis that that State should remain faithful to the Constitution and to the Government of this nation? Would you, sir, would the men who it has been shown voted for that proposition, ever have thought of doing it if you had told them that in less than fifteen years after they transferred these people over to the State of Virginia she would be in violent, flagrant war with the nation? What did this grant presuppose? Only perfect faithfulness on the part of Virginia; I mean provided all the preliminary steps were right, which I deny.

Now, Mr. President, I am told by the petitioners, and I am assured by hundreds of those who do not petition, that the conduct of the State of Virginia toward the Union men of that portion of this District is perfectly unbearable, savage, rude, outrageous; they are treated with contumely, their rights trampled under foot through the prejudices of that old State under whose jurisdiction you have placed them. That State has made war upon them, and for their Unionism they are persecuted. Their petitions are exceedingly numerous, and I am informed by some of the best men in that part of the District that there is no doubt a majority of the people there who are prompt, eager, anxious to be brought back into the District again because of the persecution of that State. They are deprived of their rights; it is impossible for them to hold up their heads there against the overbearing insolence of the State of Virginia.

It thus being put in our power by a right that nobody ever controverted, what is our duty? Shall we turn the cold shoulder on those just men who were transferred by you like cattle to a jurisdiction to which they objected—for I do not suppose that at the time this vote was taken there was a single man of the minority who did not dread to go under the jurisdiction of that old and prejudicial State as they dreaded the gates of death and hell. I say, sir, you have departed, yea, widely departed, from the great principles of American freedom and American law when you suffered a majority to transfer the minority of freemen into a foreign, hateful jurisdiction. It is not in accordance with the principles of American law nor the spirit of our institutions. Besides, it was flagrantly unconstitutional.

Now, let me ask the Senator from Delaware, is there anything in the law I have laid down that you cannot understand; are you answered? Even if all you have said is true and your logic is just, are you not answered? Virginia has made war upon the Union people of this portion of the District; they have been subjected to her insolence, her terrible persecution, her unwarrantable jurisdiction; you placed them there against their will. Had you a right to do so? Even if you had, when this war broke out, when the State of Virginia waged unwarrantable, violent war on this nation, did it not release those loyal people, did it not confer upon the Government the right at its will to end this compact, if it may be so called, and bring back this territory to where it properly belonged? Most assuredly it did. Is there any gentleman in the Senate so craven-spirited as to say that he will leave these loyal people under these accursed persecutions? Will you from Delaware do it? Oh, you do not believe they are abused! Nevertheless, just men, true men, Union men, men who have become martyrs for standing up for the rights and jurisdiction of the United States, whose truth never was doubted, tell me tales of tyranny and oppression that prevail in that portion of this District such as have not been visited upon any Union people in any other part of this Union. If you decide against them, if you turn them coldly away, if you leave these just men in the power of their enemies, they have got to flee from the homes of themselves and their fathers. They cannot live there. They are trampled under foot; and the prejudices of the old State of Virginia are such that they cannot get their rights in her courts.

I say there is full right, full liberty in Congress, on your own principles to pass this bill. You need not go back to that sophistry we have heard here to prove that this original assigning away of American citizens was just. You cannot lay hold of that as a bridge over this abyss of iniquity. Even if the compact was a truthful and a righteous one, it is within our power to say to Virginia, "You have broken it, you have violated it, you have trampled down the rights of American citizens there whom we trusted to your generosity and your equity and your righteous dealing; you waged war against them and against the Union, and thereby gave us jurisdiction over the whole subject, and having that jurisdiction, we will use it to protect men that have a right to the protection of American law." This view is in my judgment so conclusive that it is entirely unnecessary for me to follow all the sophistry we have heard to prove that the act of retrocession was constitutional. I endeavored to show upon ordinary principles of law that it was clearly unconstitutional; but when we come to this great principle lying at the bottom, is there a gentleman here who doubts the right of this Government to relieve these men from oppression and take them out from under the faithless control of that State to whom you consigned them? No, sir. You not only have the right, but it is your paramount duty before God and man to do this; it shall have my vote, and I hope will receive the vote of a majority of the Senate.

Mr. SAULSBURY. Mr. President, the honorable Senator from Ohio has placed now the justification of this act upon totally different grounds from any which he mentioned in any former argument. He now goes back to the "higher law;" the law that as between two foreign nations every compact is broken by war; and he treats this case now as though Virginia was a foreign nation; the United States foreign to her; that there was an existing contract between them; that war broke out and was waged between them; and this Government being the conquering Government has a right to dispose of the soil of Virginia as she pleases. That is an abandonment of the position formerly taken when treating Virginia as a State of the Union, and the view now asserted in support of the position which he takes, that Virginia is not a State in the Union; and that none of the States which assumed to secede are to-day States of the Union, because if he admits them to be States in the Union, then they have all the right that every other State in the Union has in reference to the question of the eminent domain over their territory.

But, sir, I apprehend that the doctrine that Virginia is not a State in the Union, and that the other States which assumed to secede are not States of the Union, although attempted to be inaugurated at the commencement of this session, has been totally abandoned. We have not heard for months upon this floor, although it was feebly whispered in the beginning of this session, that these southern States are not States in the Union. You cannot by possibility now say that they are not States in the Union, because you have passed your constitutional amendments and propose to submit them to those States as States in the Union; you appoint your revenue collectors in those States as States in the Union; you levy your taxes upon them as States in the Union, and in every act where it was necessary to name them, you named them "the State of Virginia," "the State of South Carolina," "the State of Alabama," &c. There are hundreds of acts upon your statute-books since the commencement of this war making this clear recognition of those States as being States in the Union; and the honorable Senator cannot support his view that you have a right to dispose of any portion of the State of Virginia as you please unless he goes for the doctrine that Virginia is not a State in the Union.

Mr. President, the doctrine of the honorable Senator would lead to this: if you have a right to take any portion of the State of Virginia and appropriate it to yourselves you have the right to take the whole of it. You have a right to wipe out State lines entirely, you have a right to take the whole of South Carolina and every other southern State, blot out State lines, and call it "the territory of rebellion," and hold it regardless of any former status. That is the only ground you have got to assume that Virginia is not a State in the Union, and that you have a right to wipe out State lines throughout all the southern territory and reduce them to one common territory, to be held subject to your absolute will, or the argument of the Senator falls. The proposition opens up a field of argument which, if I had time, would take hours to exhaust.

A compact, says the learned Senator, is broken by a war between the parties to the compact; applying that principle as between foreign nations to the States of this Union when a conflict arises between the States of the Union. Mr. President, I deny the application of any such principle, however applicable to the wars between foreign Powers, to a war between the different States of this Union. If you have power to make war upon any State of this Union or any number of States, what gives you the power? In what principle has it its origin? In this and nothing else, that the States agreed, in the Constitution which they formed, to live together in a common Union upon certain terms and conditions, each pledging its faith to observe those terms and conditions. If one party fails in the due performance of that duty, and you get the power to make war upon that State, for what purpose is it? You declared it in the commencement of the war. Such a doctrine as that now advanced was then scouted. You declared that the war was to preserve the Union with all the dignity and rights of the several States unimpaired; and when that object was accomplished the war ought to cease. The only pretense of right that you could have claimed for making war upon Virginia or any other southern State was on the assumption that they had violated their agreement and had failed to live with you upon the terms upon which they and you agreed upon.

If you had the power to make war at all, it was for the purpose of compelling those States to live up to their contract; and when you broke down their physical force, subdued their military power, you accomplished your purpose, and you had no right to alter or interpolate the contract when you had obtained a decree to compel a specific performance, by military power, of the contract to live according to the terms and conditions of the Constitution. If any man basis the right of this Government to wage war against the southern States upon any other principle than this, he placed it upon a ground wholly untenable, and in the prosecution of a war for any other purpose would become an aggressor himself and a dissolver of the Federal Union. Why, sir, if the principle for which the Senator contends be true, if you do not admit Virginia to be a State, you would have a right to say that she should be represented by one Senator on this floor instead of two, because according to his theory war discharges all obligations, puts an end to all contracts and compacts, and it would be a mere matter of grace and favor on the part of the Congress of the United States to admit Virginia and the other southern States here with one Senator on this floor. And yet the Constitution of the United States says each State shall have two Senators.

Mr. President, the argument of the Senator, in my judgment, rests upon a wholly wrongful perception of the true nature, theory, and character of our Federal system. He thinks that because the State of Virginia attempted to secede, therefore she was out of the Union, and you have absolute control over her territory and people; that you may reduce the whole southern States into one territory, hold them subject to your absolute will and pleasure; that you may take any portion of their soil and annex it to this District, or you may annex it to any State in the Union. According to his theory, you may annex Virginia to Massachusetts; you may do what you please with it.

But, sir, I will not argue against a proposition which the general public sentiment and opinion of the whole country now condemns. The doctrine of "dead States" no longer exists in the fancy of the most imaginary. The principle which has been started now for the first time in reference to this question, that war puts an end to all compacts, has no possible application to a war between the States of this Union, the war being waged for the preservation of the Union under and in accordance with the Constitution of the country. I will not detain the Senate any longer.

Mr. WILLEY. I do not rise, sir, to add anything to the remarks which I made the other day on the propriety of bringing the former county of Alexandria back into the District of Columbia. The discussion of this bill has only increased my conviction of the impropriety originally of transferring the section of the District south of the Potomac to the State of Virginia. That it ought to be a part of the District, it seems to me is perfectly obvious; but at the same time I hesitate as much about the propriety of passing this bill now as I did at first. It seems to me to be exclusively a question of law. It must result in that at last; and the passage of this bill under existing circumstances, if I am correct in my conception of what must be the ultimate result of the question, would only serve to complicate the difficulties already existing and to entail mischief and misery upon the people of Alexandria and on that side of the river.

If the law retroceding the county of Alexandria to the State of Virginia be constitutional, it seems to me that it is utterly beyond our control. Virginia, by a solemn act of her Legislature, agreed to accept the cession if made. The cession was made. Here, then, is a compact executed, complete, beyond our control, provided Congress had the constitutional power to pass that act. If, therefore, it was constitutional it is beyond our control, and any act that we may pass will only place ourselves in a false position, and, as I said just now, complicate the difficulties that are upon us. If the law of retrocession be unconstitutional, then our action is equally nugatory; it is repealing a law which in point of fact does not exist; it is making that null and void which is null and void; and the only way in which that fact can be certainly and satisfactorily ascertained will be by a resort to the judiciary, that we may have the thing decided by a tribunal whose decisions shall be ultimate in the premises. If we pass this bill it will only drive the party on the other side into court. Why not, if necessary, pass a joint resolution directing the Attorney General of the United States to make a case by quo warranto or some other proceeding?

But, sir, I rose principally to ask the attention of the honorable Senator from Ohio to some of the provisions of this bill. I have nothing to add to what I said the other day on the impropriety of passing the bill; but I respectfully suggest to the honorable Senator from Ohio that before this bill passes, if it shall pass, it ought to be subjected to very critical and thorough revision. Allow me to direct his attention to the first section. It is there declared "that the act of Congress approved July 9, A. D. 1846, retroceding to the State of Virginia that portion of the district ten miles square, as provided by the Constitution"—I do not understand that; I do not understand that the Constitution ever provided that we should receive from Virginia ten miles square, but that seems to be the provision of this section—"known as the District of Columbia."

Mr. WADE. I do not think there is any obscurity in it. Perhaps there is more language there than there need be; but it is not obscure; it is easily understood.

Mr. WILLEY. As I understand the terms of this bill, it means that Congress did retrocede to Virginia the whole District ten miles square.

Mr. WADE. Oh, no.

Mr. WILLEY. Certainly that is the language of the section. It wants a modification in some portion or other to designate the portion of the District to which reference is had.

I also desire to direct the attention of the Senator to the fifth section. It provides "that from and after the passage of this act all civil offices in the said portion of the District of Columbia south of the Potomac, in the city of Alexandria and what is known as the county of Alexandria, shall be declared vacant"—all officers of every kind, as I understand—"and the vacancies so created shall be filled by new appointments or elections, to be made and held under the laws, regulations, and qualifications provided by Congress for elections and electors in the District of Columbia."

What is to become of that portion of the country during the interval? Those offices are to be vacated upon the passage of this act. According to the terms and provisions of this act they cannot be filled except by an election under the laws and regulations of the District of Columbia. It will require some time to give the notice. I am not familiar exactly with what the provisions of law are in the District of Columbia regulating elections, but certainly it would require some time to give notice of the election. In the mean time, as I understand it, under the operation of this section the city government of Alexandria would be wholly dissolved, there would be no means of keeping the peace, there would be no means of administering justice at all, there would be a perfect interregnum in the existence of all authority to execute the laws or to maintain order. It seems to me that the section ought to be modified, and that these offices should not be vacated until elections can be had, if the bill shall pass.

I would also direct the attention of the Senator to the second section. It seems to me that the provisions of the bill are very vague and indefinite, and if passed in its present form must necessarily involve the people of the county of Alexandria in great difficulty.

Mr. WADE. I have looked pretty carefully into this bill, and it provides for every contingency I can think of that will arise after the repeal. It may be that there is some reason why it should be altered, but the first section does not, as I understand, attempt to convey any more than that portion of the original territory which was taken from Virginia. It speaks of the act of 1846, by which "that portion of said ten miles square, lying south of the Potomac, was ceded back to the State of Virginia, in violation of the intent and meaning of the Constitution," &c. That is as definite as I could make it.

Mr. WILLEY. But it is the first section to which I referred.

Mr. WADE. This is in the first section. The section goes on to recite about the cession of ten miles square, and the like, and when it comes to describe the act repealed it specifies the act of 1846, by which "that portion of said ten miles square lying south of the Potomac was ceded back to the State of Virginia." I do not think it could be made more definite.

Mr. WILLEY. The Senator is quoting from the preamble.

Mr. WADE. The section refers to that act by which the retrocession was made. I cannot make it any more clear. It refers directly to that.

Mr. WILLEY. The first section reads as follows:

That the act of Congress approved July 9, A. D. 1846, retroceding to the State of Virginia that portion of the district ten miles square, as provided by the Constitution, known as the District of Columbia.

What "portion of the District" is that?

Mr. WADE. Let us look at the preamble and see if there is any obscurity; if there is, I cannot discover it. The preamble recites, among other things, that "by an act of Congress approved July 9, A. D. 1846, that portion of said ten miles square lying south of the Potomac was ceded back to the State of Virginia, in violation of the intent and meaning of the Constitution of the United States, and to the great peril of the capital as aforesaid;" and then the first section "therefore" proceeds to enact "that the act of Congress approved July 9, A. D. 1846, retroceding to the State of Virginia that portion of the district ten miles square, as provided by the Constitution, known as the District of Columbia, be, and the same is hereby, henceforth, and forever repealed and declared null and void."

Mr. WILLEY. What "portion?"

Mr. WADE. That portion that came from Virginia, of course.

Mr. WILLEY. It does not say so.

Mr. WADE. I cannot see that there is any obscurity in it. I do not think it is defective in that particular. The act is referred to by the date of its enactments and by everything else, and I do not see any ambiguity in the description of the act itself. I think the bill is very well provided with all the safeguards that such a bill ought to have, in my judgment.

Mr. WILLEY. I do not think I got the Senator's ear when I referred to the fifth section.

Mr. WADE. If the Senator can suggest an amendment I shall be very happy to have it done.

Mr. WILLEY. I think the fifth section would leave the county of Alexandria in a very embarrassing condition from the date of the passage of the act until the time that the offices vacated by the act shall be filled by an election. There seems to be no provision whatever for the interim.

Mr. GUTHRIE. I am satisfied that we shall do more harm than good by the passage of this bill, and it is trenching on the prerogative of another department of this Government. If the act of 1846 is void, the courts can readily declare it so; if it is not void, we shall do infinite mischief in relation to the government of Alexandria and the people on that side of the river by repealing it. Even if I was satisfied that the original act was void, as I am not, I do not see any benefit to accrue to the country or to the harmony of the States by the passage of this bill.

The bill was ordered to be engrossed for a third reading, and was read the third time.

Mr. JOHNSON. I ask for the yeas and nays on the passage of the bill.

The yeas and nays were ordered.

Mr. LANE, of Indiana. Before the vote is taken I desire to say that I have paired with my colleague [Mr. HENDRICKS] on this question. If he were here he would vote against the bill; and if I were at liberty to vote I should vote for it.

Mr. RAMSEY. The Senator from Iowa [Mr. GRIMES] desired me to say, when he was leaving the Hall, that he had paired off with his colleague [Mr. KIRKWOOD] on this question.

The question being taken by yeas and nays, resulted—yeas 13, nays 17; as follows:

YEAS—Messrs. Anthony, Conness, Edmunds, Harris, Howard, Howe, Nye, Pomeroy, Ramsey, Stewart, Sumner, Wade, and Wilson—13.

NAYS—Messrs. Clark, Davis, Doolittle, Fessenden, Foster, Guthrie, Henderson, Johnson, Morgan, Norton, Kiddle, Saulsbury, Sprague, Trumbull, Van Winkle, Willey, and Williams—17.

ABSENT—Messrs. Brown, Buckalew, Chandler, Cowan, Cragin, Creswell, Dixon, Grimes, Hendricks, Kirkwood, Lane of Indiana, Lane of Kansas, McDougall, Morrill, Nesmith, Poland, Sherman, Wright, and Yates—19.

So the bill was rejected.

CONSULAR AND DIPLOMATIC BILL.

The Senate proceeded to consider its amendments to the bill (H. R. No. 261) making appropriations for the consular and diplomatic expenses of the Government for the year ending 30th June, 1867, and for other purposes, disagreed to by the House of Representatives; and on motion of Mr. FESSENDEN, it was Resolved, That the Senate insist upon its amendments to the said bill disagreed to by the House of Representatives, and agree to the conference asked by the House on the disagreeing votes of the two Houses thereon.

Ordered, That the conferees on the part of the Senate be appointed by the President pro tempore.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore appointed Mr. SUMNER, Mr. TRUMBULL, and Mr. GRIMES.

ORDER OF BUSINESS.

Mr. RAMSEY. I move that the Senate proceed to the consideration of the bill (S. No. 387) to secure the speedy construction of the Northern Pacific railroad and telegraph line, and to secure to the Government the use of the same for postal, military, and other purposes.

Mr. HENDERSON. I suppose that the bill which was taken up on my motion last evening, and which came up regularly at one o'clock to-day, but which I then consented should be informally postponed in order to allow other measures to be taken up, is now the business properly before the Senate. That being so, I move that the Senate do now adjourn, so that that bill may be left as the unfinished business to come up to-morrow. I desire that the Senate shall act upon it.

Mr. HOWARD. I hope the Senator from Missouri will withdraw his motion, and let us take the vote on the proposition of the Senator from Minnesota.

Mr. HENDERSON. I insist upon my motion. The motion was agreed to; there being, on a division—yeas 15, noes 11; and the Senate adjourned.

HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES.

WEDNESDAY, July 11, 1866.

The House met at twelve o'clock m. Prayer by the Chaplain, Rev. C. B. BOYNTON.

Mr. HALE. I move that the reading of the Journal be dispensed with.

Mr. WASHBURN, of Illinois. I object.

The SPEAKER. Objection is made and the Journal will be read.

The Journal of yesterday was read and approved.

DORENCE ATWATER.

Mr. HALE. I ask unanimous consent to submit the following resolution, under instruction of the select committee, in the case of Dorence Atwater:

Resolved, That the Secretary of War be directed to communicate to this House copies of the record and proceedings of the court-martial held at the city of Washington, in or about the month of September, 1865, in the case of Dorence Atwater, late a private in the general service of the United States Army, including all testimony taken before the said court-martial in said case, together with all orders and papers relating to the finding and sentence of said court-martial in said case, and to the execution thereof; and also copies of a communication or report made by the Judge Advocate General of the United States Army to the President of the United States, in or about the month of June last, in relation to said case, and of a communication from General Townsend, Acting Adjutant General of the United States Army, to the President about the same date, in relation to the said case, being the same papers of which copies were requested from the President by a resolution of this House, passed June 25, 1866, and which papers have not been furnished to this House.

There being no objection, the resolution was considered and agreed to.

LEAVE OF ABSENCE.

The SPEAKER asked indefinite leave of absence for Messrs. DIXON and DAVIS.

Leave was granted.

ELECTION CONTEST—FULLER VERSUS DAWSON.

Mr. PAINE. I rise to call up the report of the Committee of Elections in the contested-election case of Smith Fuller against John L. Dawson, from the twenty-first district of the State of Pennsylvania.

Mr. STEVENS. I ask the gentleman to yield to me to submit reports from the Committee on Appropriations in reference to general appropriation bills, which I do not think will take up much time.

Mr. PAINE. I yield for that purpose.

CONSULAR AND DIPLOMATIC BILL.

Mr. STEVENS, from the Committee on Appropriations, reported back amendments of the Senate to House bill No. 261, making appropriations for the consular and diplomatic expenses of the Government for the year ending 30th June, 1867, and for other purposes, recommending concurrence in some and non-concurrence in others.

Mr. SCHENCK. The consul at Quebec is included in the category of those whose salary is to cease at the termination of the war. Now, this should be corrected. We have had a consul starving there, while the consul general and others who are familiar with the subject say his salary should be $1,500.

Mr. STEVENS. That will be considered in the committee of conference.

Mr. RICE, of Massachusetts, moved to transfer the consulate at "Spezzia," Italy, from schedule C to schedule B, and insert it next after "Smyrna."

The motion was agreed to.

Mr. RAYMOND. Does that fix the salary?

Mr. KASSON. That will be considered by the committee of conference.

The report of the committee was adopted.

Mr. STEVENS moved that the House do further insist on its disagreement to the amendments of the Senate and ask for a committee of conference.

The motion was agreed to.

TARIFF BILL.

Mr. WRIGHT. I want to know whether my vote is recorded correctly on the vote taken yesterday in reference to the duty on coal. I voted to strike out $1 50 a ton and in lieu thereof to insert fifty cents.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman stands recorded as voting against concurrence in the amendment of the Committee of the Whole on the state of the Union.

LEGISLATIVE, ETC., APPROPRIATION BILL.

Mr. STEVENS, from the Committee on Appropriations, reported back the amendments of the Senate to House bill No. 213, making appropriations for the legislative, executive, and judicial expenses of the Government for the year ending the 30th of June, 1867, recommending concurrence in some and non-concurrence in others.

It was agreed, by unanimous consent, that the report of the committee should be adopted without question, except where a separate vote was demanded.

The first amendment upon which a separate vote was demanded was in the clause relating to the Library of Congress, to strike out "three," and insert "five" and strike out "$10,800" and insert "$12,600;" so that the clause will read:

For compensation of the librarian, five assistant librarians, messenger, and laborers, $12,600.

Mr. WASHBURN, of Illinois. What is the reason for that increase?

Mr. KASSON. It is made necessary because of the extension of the Library.

Mr. STEVENS. The committee of the Senate investigated the matter and reported that the increase was necessary.

Mr. HULBURD. Another reason is that the Smithsonian library has been transferred to the Library of Congress, which involves the necessity of increased assistance. It has been unanimously agreed to by the Joint Committee on the Library.

The amendment was concurred in.

Mr. BINGHAM. I move to insert the following:

For compensation of the bailiff of the Court of Claims, $1,500 in full for his services for the current year, at which sum his salary is hereby fixed.

Mr. WASHBURN, of Illinois. Is not that a private bill? If it is, it is not in order to a general appropriation bill.

The SPEAKER. This is a public office, and it has been held that an amendment to change the salary of a public office is in order to a general appropriation bill.

Mr. BINGHAM. I will say that this has been done at the suggestion of more than one of the judges of that court. The salary at present of $1,000 is insufficient to supply his family. He is engaged a greater part of the year, and is a faithful officer. He has no perquisites.

Mr. KASSON. Will the gentleman from Ohio state whether this has been recommended by the judges of the court or by any committee?

Mr. BINGHAM. I can only say this: that it was suggested to me by some of the judges of the court, and I mentioned it to the chairman of the committee, who told me to offer the amendment.

Mr. WASHBURN, of Illinois. I hope the House will not pass any such proposition as this, to go back and increase the salary of a messenger upon a bill that has made the progress which this has; and I think it is out of order to move such an amendment at this time. It is not reported by any committee.

Mr. BINGHAM. It is not uncommon to make an amendment of this sort; and I trust the House will consider that the bailiff of this court has official duties to perform which are essential to the discharge of the functions of the court itself, and that the salary is insufficient, as must be known to every member of the House. Talk of a thousand dollars a year to sustain a bailiff and his family!

Mr. WASHBURN, of Illinois. How many days does this court sit during the year?

Mr. BINGHAM. I cannot answer that fully, but I know the fact that it has sat generally hitherto four or five months in one session continuously, and then held adjourned sessions. It now has adjourned to meet, I believe, during the current month, after having held a session of three or four months.

Mr. WASHBURN, of Illinois. It probably is in session about six months, and that is longer than it should be. I think it is going on so far with its jurisdiction that it will be the imperative duty of Congress to repeal the act.

The bailiff of the Supreme Court only gets three dollars a day, and now it is proposed to give this man $1,500 a year.

Mr. BINGHAM. Mr. Speaker, this is a grand exhibition of economy. The gentleman thinks this court ought to go without a bailiff and be suspended altogether. I undertake to say that the official records of that court establish the fact indisputably that it has saved to the Treasury of the United States within the last twelve months $10,000,000.

Mr. WASHBURN, of Illinois. I take issue with the gentleman on that, and I will go to the jury.

Mr. BINGHAM. The gentleman can take issue with me as quick as he pleases. I undertake to say that the claims rejected by the court within the last year amount to $10,000,000.

Mr. WASHBURN, of Illinois. I would like to ask how many millions of dollars that court has allowed.

Mr. BINGHAM. I will say this: it was my good fortune to serve some three months in that court at the request of the President of the United States, owing to a difficulty that arose between himself and a solicitor of the United States, and my recollection about it now is, that the court during that term passed upon claims in the aggregate to the amount of about ten million dollars, and the whole amount of its decrees against the Treasury was not more than $60,000 in gold. I trust the gentleman is answered. There was not a million, nor a half million, nor a quarter of a million dollars decreed during the term against the Treasury. I know that there was one decree rendered of $80,000 which was adjudicated in the previous year.

Mr. WASHBURN, of Illinois. Was that the grant case?

Mr. BINGHAM. No, sir.

Mr. KASSON. Will the gentleman from Ohio allow this to come to a vote pretty soon instead of discussing the general character of this proposition? There are many amendments to be acted upon.

Mr. BINGHAM. I am willing to have a vote upon it. I demand the previous question. The previous question was seconded and the main question ordered.

The question being taken on the amendment offered by Mr. BINGHAM to the Senate's amendment, there were—yeas 34, noes 34; no quorum voting.

Tellers were ordered, and the Speaker appointed Messrs. WASHBURN, of Illinois, and BINGHAM.

The House divided; and the tellers reported—yeas 51, noes 50.

Mr. WASHBURN, of Illinois. I demand the yeas and nays.

The yeas and nays were ordered.

The question was taken; and it was decided in the negative—yeas 54, nays 65, not voting 63; as follows:

YEAS—Messrs. Anderson, Delos R. Ashley, James M. Ashley, Baxter, Bidwell, Bingham, Boyer, Reader W. Clarke, Dawson, Donnelly, Driggs, Eckley, Garfield, Griswold, Harris, Hart, Hayes, Higby, Hooper, Chester D. Hubbard, Ingersoll, Jencks, Julian, Kelley, Kelso, Kerr, Kuykendall, Le Blond, Longyear, Marston, McCullough, McKuer, Miller, Morris, Myers, Niblack, Nicholson, O'Neill, Orth, Paine, Patterson, Plants, Raymond, Alexander H. Washburn, Wentworth, Williams, James F. Wilson, Windom, and Wright—65.

NOT VOTING—Messrs. Ames, Ancona, Banks, Beaman, Blaine, Blow, Brandegee, Buckland, Bundy, Chanler, Sidney Clarke, Conkling, Culiom, Culver, Darling, Davis, Dawes, Delano, Deming, Denison, Dixon, Dodge, Dumont, Farnsworth, Goodyear, Grier, Grinnell, Hill, Hogan, Hotchkiss, Demas Hubbard, Edwin N. Hubbell, Humphrey, Johnson, Jones, Ladin, Loan, Lynch, McIndoe, Moorhead, Morrill, Moulton, Noell, Phelps, Pomeroy, Radford, Samuel J. Randall, William H. Randall, Schenck, Shanklin, Sloan, Smith, Starr, Stevens, Stillwell, Taber, Francis Thomas, Trimble, Upson, Warner, Welker, Stephen F. Wilson, and Winfield—63.

So the amendment to the amendment was not agreed to.

During the roll-call,

Mr. ASHLEY, of Ohio, said: If I had been present last evening, I should have voted against the tariff bill.

The result of the vote having been announced as above recorded, the amendment of the Senate was agreed to.

Mr. STEVENS. I am reminded by the gentleman from Wisconsin [Mr. PAINE] that the half hour has expired.

MESSAGE FROM THE SENATE.

A message from the Senate, by Mr. FORNEY, their Secretary, informed the House that the Senate had passed a bill (H. R. No. 611) to provide for making the town of Whitehall, New York, a port of delivery.

Also that the Senate had passed a bill (H. R. No. 50) to amend the fifth section of an act entitled "An act donating public lands to the several States and Territories which may provide colleges for the benefit of agriculture and the mechanic arts," approved July 2, 1862, so as to extend the time within which the provisions of said act shall be accepted and such colleges established, with amendments, in which he was directed to ask the concurrence of the House.

The message further informed the House that the Senate had disagreed to the tenth amendment of the House to the bill of the Senate (No. 343) to quiet land titles in California, and had agreed to the other amendments of the House to said bill.

Mr. PAINE resumed the floor.

LAND GRANT TO KANSAS.

Mr. LOAN. I rise to a privileged question. I desire to make a report from a committee of conference.

Mr. PAINE. Is that in order when I have the floor?

The SPEAKER. It is a report of a committee of conference, which can be received even during a call of the House, and on page 72 of Barclay's Digest it is held that, "like the motion to go to the Speaker's table, it may interrupt a member who is on the floor speaking."

The report of the committee of conference was read, as follows:

The committee of conference on the disagreeing votes of the two Houses on the bill (S. No. 145) entitled "An act for a grant of land to the State of Kansas to aid in the construction of the Northern Kansas railroad and telegraph," having met, after full and free conference have agreed to recommend, and do recommend, to their respective Houses as follows:

That the Senate agree to the amendment of the House, with an amendment, as follows: strike out all after the word "that," in the first line, section one, of said bill, and insert in lieu thereof the following:

"There is hereby granted to the State of Kansas for the use and benefit of the St. Joseph and Denver City Railroad Company, the same being a corporation organized under the laws of the State of Kansas, to construct and operate a railroad from Elwood, in Kansas, westwardly, via Maryville, in the same State, so as to effect a junction with the Union Pacific railroad, or any branch thereof not further west than the one hundredth meridian of west longitude, every alternate section of land in Kansas, designated by odd numbers, for ten sections in width on each side of said road, to the point of intersection. But in case it shall appear that the United States have, when the line or route of said road is definitely fixed, sold any section or any part thereof, granted as aforesaid, or that the right of preemption or homestead settlement has attached to the same, or that the same has been reserved by the United States for any purpose whatever, then it shall be the duty of the Secretary of the Interior to cause to be selected for the purposes aforesaid, from the public lands of the United States nearest to tiers of sections above specified, so much land, in alternate sections or parts of sections designated by odd numbers, as shall be equal to such lands as the United States have sold, reserved, or otherwise appropriated, or to which the rights of preemption or homestead settlements have attached as aforesaid; which lands, thus indicated by odd numbers, and selected by direction of the Secretary of the Interior as aforesaid, shall be held by the State of Kansas for the use and purpose aforesaid: Provided, That the land to be so selected shall in no case be located further than twenty miles from the line of said road: Provided further, That the lands hereby granted for and on account of said road shall be exclusively applied in the construction of the same, and for no other purpose whatever, and shall be disposed of as in this act hereinafter provided: Provided also, That no part of the land granted by this act shall be applied to aid in the construction of any railroad or part thereof for the construction of which any previous grant of land or bonds has been made by Congress: And provided further, That any and all lands heretofore reserved to the United States by any act of Congress, or in any other manner by competent authority, for the purpose of aiding in any object of internal improvement, or for any other purpose whatsoever, be, and the same are hereby, reserved to the United States from the operations of this act, except so far as it may be found necessary to locate the route of said road through said lands; in which case the right of way, one hundred feet in width on each side of said road only shall be granted, subject to the approval of the President of the United States.

"Sec. 2. And be it further enacted, That the sections and parts of sections of land which by such grant shall remain to the United States, within ten miles on each side of said road, shall not be sold for less than double the minimum price of the public lands when sold; nor shall any of said lands become subject to sale at private entry until the same shall have been first offered at public sale to the highest bidder, at or above the increased minimum price, as aforesaid: Provided, That actual and bona fide settlers, under the provisions of the preemption and homestead laws of the United States, may, after due proof of settlement, improvement, cultivation, and occupation, as now provided by law, purchase the same at the increased minimum price aforesaid: And provided also, That settlers on any of said reserve sections, under the provisions of the homestead law, who improve, occupy, and cultivate the same for a period of five years, and comply with the several conditions and requirements of said act, shall be entitled to patents for in amount not exceeding eighty acres each, anything in this act to the contrary notwithstanding.

"Sec. 3. And be it further enacted, That the grant of lands hereby made is upon condition that said company, after the construction of its road, shall keep it in repair and use, and shall at all times be in readiness to transport troops, munitions of war, supplies and public stores upon its road for the Government when required to do so by any Department thereof, the Government at all times having the preference in the use of the road for all the purposes aforesaid at fair and reasonable rates of compensation, not exceeding that paid by private individuals or the average paid for like services on other roads. And the lands hereby granted, held, and reserved as aforesaid shall inure to the benefit of said company, as follows: when the Governor of the State of Kansas shall certify that any section of ten consecutive miles of said road is completed in a good, substantial, and workmanlike manner as a first-class railroad, then the said Secretary of the Interior shall issue to the said company patents for so many sections of the land hereinbefore granted as lie opposite to and contemporaneous with the said completed sections; and when certificates of the Governor, aforesaid, shall be presented to said Secretary of the completion, as aforesaid, of each successive section of ten consecutive miles of said road, the said Secretary shall in like manner issue to said company patents for the said sections of said land as aforesaid, for each of said sections of road until said road shall be completed: Provided, That if said railroad company or its assigns shall fail to complete at least one section of said road each year from the date of its acceptance of the grant provided for in this act, then its right to the lands for said section so failing of completion shall revert to the Government of the United States: Provided further, That if said road is not completed within ten years from the date of the acceptance of the grant hereinbefore made, the lands remaining unpatented shall revert to the United States.

"Sec. 4. And be it further enacted, That as soon as the said company shall file with the Secretary of the Interior maps of its line, designating the route thereof, it shall be the duty of the said Secretary to withdraw from the market the lands granted by this act, in such manner as may be best calculated to effect the purposes of this act and subserve the public interest.

"Sec. 5. And be it further enacted, That the United States mail shall be transported on said road and its extension, under the direction of the Post Office Department, at such prices as Congress may by law provide: Provided, That until such price is fixed by law the Postmaster General shall have power to fix the compensation.

"Sec. 6. And be it further enacted, That the right of way through the public lands be, and the same is hereby, granted to said St. Joseph and Denver City Railroad Company, its successors and assigns, for the construction of a railroad as proposed; and the right is hereby given to said corporation to take from the public lands adjacent to the line of said road material for the construction thereof. Said way is granted to said railroad to the extent of one hundred feet in width on each side of said road where it may pass through the public domain; also all necessary ground for station buildings, workshops, depots, machine-shops, switches, side-tracks, turn-tables, and water-stations.

"Sec. 7. And be it further enacted, That the acceptance of the terms, conditions, and impositions of this act by the said St. Joseph and Denver City Railroad Company shall be signified in writing, under the corporate seal of the said company, duly executed pursuant to the direction of its board of directors first had and obtained, which acceptance shall be made within six months after the passage of this act and not afterward, and shall be deposited with the Secretary of the Interior."

And that the House agree to the same.

S. C. POMEROY,
B. GRATZ BROWN,
GEORGE READ BIDDLE,
Managers on the part of the Senate.
BENJAMIN F. LOAN,
SIDNEY CLARKE,
CHARLES A. ELDRIDGE,
Managers on the part of the House.

Mr. LOAN. I deem it necessary only to say to the House in explanation of this report, that the committee of conference agreed to take substantially the first two sections of the Senate bill and the last section of the House bill and make of them a new bill, with this single exception, that the conterminous principle, as it is called, contained in the Senate bill has been added to the House bill. It is simply the bill as it passed the House with the first two sections of the Senate bill substituted for the first two sections of the House bill, with the conterminous principle, as it is called, of the Senate bill added to the House bill. I call the previous question on the report of the committee of conference.

The previous question was seconded and the main question ordered; and under the operation thereof the report of the committee of conference was agreed to.

Mr. LOAN moved to reconsider the vote by which the report of the committee of conference was adopted; and also moved to lay the motion to reconsider upon the table.

The latter motion was agreed to.

ELECTION CONTEST—AGAIN.

The House resumed the consideration of the contested-election case of Smith Fuller vs. John L. Dawson, of the twenty-first congressional district of the State of Pennsylvania, upon which Mr. PAINE, from the Committee of Elections, had submitted a report in favor of the sitting member.

Mr. PAINE. The chairman of the Committee on the Post Office and Post Roads [Mr. ALLEY] seems to think it a hardship that he should be robbed of the morning hour to-day, and therefore I promised to move that this case be postponed until after the expiration of the morning hour to-day. But I would not have made that promise if I could have foreseen that an hour and a half would have been taken up by other business. But having made the promise, I will move to postpone the further consideration of this subject until after the expiration of the morning hour to-day.

The motion to postpone was agreed to.

ORGANIZATION AND INSTRUCTION OF MILITIA.

Mr. PAINE. Before the morning hour commences, I ask unanimous consent to introduce for consideration at this time a joint resolution recommending the organization and instruction of the militia by the several States, and providing for the distribution of ordnance and ordnance stores.

No objection was made.

The joint resolution was read a first and second time.

The joint resolution was read at length. It provides that in order to preserve and perpetuate the military knowledge now possessed by the people of the United States, and to render useful to some extent the large amount of ordnance and ordnance stores that have been accumulated by the Government of the United States, it is for the interest of the Republic that, until a uniform militia system shall have been adopted by Congress, the several States and Territories should thoroughly organize, arm, equip, and instruct the militia in accordance with their own laws; and such organization, arming, equipment, and instruction is hereby recommended to the several States and Territories.

The second section provides that two thirds of all the ordnance and ordnance stores of each and every kind now in the possession of the United States, excepting only such as may be required for the Navy or the permanent fortification of the country, shall be distributed by the Secretary of War to the several States and Territories and to the District of Columbia, at the expense of the United States, in accordance with the provisions of the act of April 3, 1808, entitled "An act making provisions for arming and equipping the whole body of the militia of the United States," and the act of March 3, 1855, entitled "An act making appropriations for the support of the Army for the year ending the 30th of June, 1856, and for other purposes;" provided, that the quantity issued to either of the Territories or to the District of Columbia shall not exceed the proportion to which the smallest State shall be entitled by law; and provided, also that the distribution to the late rebel States shall be postponed until hereafter authorized by law, but the distribution to the other States and to the Territories shall be made forthwith.

The question was upon ordering the joint resolution to be engrossed and read a third time.

Mr. KASSON. Is this joint resolution before the House by unanimous consent, or has it been reported from a committee?

The SPEAKER. It was introduced by unanimous consent by the gentleman from Wisconsin, [Mr. PAINE.]

Mr. KASSON. I hope the gentleman from Wisconsin [Mr. PAINE] will not press this joint resolution to a vote now. It provides for the disbursement of what has cost the Government several million dollars, and a great deal of which would be utterly useless to the States when distributed to them. I should like to read it in print, and I suppose it will appear in the Daily Globe to-morrow.

Mr. PAINE. This measure has been very carefully considered by myself, and I hope it will be passed now. I hope the gentleman will not press his objection to it.

Mr. WILSON, of Iowa. I would inquire of the Chair if the joint resolution is now pending before the House.

The SPEAKER. It is; and the question is upon ordering it to be engrossed and read a third time.

Mr. PAINE. I call the previous question. Mr. LE BLOND. I desire to say that if I had heard the joint resolution read, I should have objected to it in the first instance. But we had no means of knowing what was in the joint resolution until it was finally reported.

The SPEAKER. The title was reported, as is usual, and no objection was made.

Mr. THAYER. I think the general impression of the House was that it was read through simply for information. The House should not certainly pass so important a measure as this without consideration.

Mr. PAINE. If the motion for the previous question is in order I insist upon it.

Mr. FINCK. I would have objected to the introduction of this joint resolution if I had known what was in it.

The SPEAKER. Any member had the right to reserve his objection until after it was read through; but no member reserved any such right.

Mr. KASSON. Do I understand that an objection will not prevail now?

The SPEAKER. It will not.

Mr. ROSS. Is it in order to move to refer this joint resolution to the Committee on Military Affairs?

The SPEAKER. It is not pending the call for the previous question. If the previous question is not seconded then the motion will be in order.

The question was taken upon seconding the demand for the previous question; and upon a division there were—ayes 53, noes 40.

Before the result of the vote was announced, Mr. FINCK called for tellers.

Tellers were ordered; and Messrs FINCK and PAINE were appointed.

The House again divided; and the tellers reported—ayes sixty-six, noes not counted.

So the previous question was seconded and the main question was ordered.

The joint resolution was ordered to be engrossed and read a third time; and being engrossed, it was accordingly read the third time.

The question was upon the passage of the joint resolution.

Mr. PAINE. I call the previous question on the passage.

The previous question was seconded and the main question ordered.

Mr. ELDRIDGE. I ask for the yeas and nays on the passage of the joint resolution.

The yeas and nays were not ordered.

Mr. FINCK. Is a motion in order to refer this bill to the Committee on Military Affairs?

The SPEAKER. That motion is not now in order, as the House is acting under the operation of the previous question.

Mr. FINCK. I think that the bill ought to receive the examination of some committee before being passed.

The joint resolution was passed.

Mr. PAINE moved to reconsider the vote by which the joint resolution was passed; and also moved that the motion to reconsider be laid on the table.

The latter motion was agreed to.

NATIONAL BANKING SYSTEM.

Mr. HOOPER, of Massachusetts. I am directed by the Committee on Banking and Currency to report back the bill (H. R. No. 677) entitled "An act to amend an act entitled 'An act to provide a national currency secured by a pledge of United States bonds, and to provide for the circulation and redemption thereof, and for other purposes,'" with an amendment in the nature of a substitute. I move that the substitute be printed; and that the bill be made a special order for Friday next immediately after the morning hour.

The motion was agreed to.

ORDER OF BUSINESS.

The SPEAKER. The morning hour has now commenced, and the first business in order is the presentation of reports from the Committee on the Post Office and Post Roads.

GOVERNMENTAL USE OF TELEGRAPHS.

Mr. ALLEY, from the Committee on the Post Office and Post Roads, reported back the bill (S. No. 357) entitled "An act to aid in the construction of telegraph lines and to secure to the Government the use of the same for postal, military, and other purposes."

The bill, which was read at length, provides, in the first section, that any telegraph company now organized or which may hereafter be organized, under the laws of any State in the Union, shall have the right to construct, maintain, and operate lines of telegraph through and over any portion of the public domain of the United States, over and along any of the military or post roads of the United States which have been or may hereafter be declared such by act of Congress, and over, under, or across the navigable streams or waters of the United States. Such lines of telegraph are to be so constructed and maintained as not to obstruct the navigation of such streams and waters, or interfere with the ordinary travel on such military or post roads. And any of said companies shall have the right to take and use from such public lands the necessary stone, timber, and other materials for its posts, piers, stations, and other needful uses in the construction, maintenance, and operation of the lines of telegraph, and may preempt and use such portion of the unoccupied public lands subject to preemption through which its lines of telegraph may be located as may be necessary for its stations, not exceeding forty acres for each station, but such stations not to be within fifteen miles of each other.

The second section provides that telegraphic communications between the several Departments of the Government of the United States and their officers and agents shall, in their transmission over the lines of any of the companies, have priority over all other business, and shall be sent at rates to be annually fixed by the Postmaster General.

The third section proposes to enact that the rights and privileges granted shall not be transferred by any company acting under this act to any other corporation, association, or person; and it is provided that the United States may at any time after the expiration of five years from the date of the passage of this act, purchase, for postal, military, or other purposes, all the telegraph lines, property, and effects of any or all of the companies at an appraised value, to be ascertained by five competent, disinterested persons, two of whom shall be selected by the Postmaster General of the United States, two by the company interested, and one by the four so previously selected.

The fourth section provides that before any telegraph company shall exercise any of the powers or privileges conferred by this act, such company shall file their written acceptance with the Postmaster General of the restrictions and obligations required by this act.

Mr. KASSON. I ask the gentleman from Massachusetts [Mr. ALLEY] to yield to me that I may offer as an amendment a provision that—

No powers, grants, or privileges hereby conferred shall be construed to apply to any telegraphic communication between the United States and any foreign country.

The gentleman will recollect we have offered some special inducements to the construction of an Atlantic telegraph, and this bill might be construed so as to reopen the whole subject. I hope there will be no objection to the amendment.

Mr. ALLEY. I should be glad to give way to the gentleman from Iowa that if my amendment, for I see no objection to it except that if any amendment be adopted by the House the effect will be to send the bill back to the Senate, which of course I could not consent to at this late period of the session. I therefore must decline to allow this or any other amendment to be made to the bill.

Mr. KASSON. I think an amendment like that I offer certainly will not expose the bill to be lost in the Senate.

Mr. ALLEY. No one knows better than the gentleman from Iowa that if the bill goes back to the Senate with an amendment, however unimportant, it will fail to pass at this session.

Mr. KASSON. A Senator asked me to get the House to send something to them because they were passing fancy bills for want of something to do.

Mr. ALLEY. This is an important bill to the American people. Influences have been brought to bear upon the House and the Senate to defeat it; I may say influences of an extraordinary character. Appeals have been made by those who are opposed to this bill to allow them to amend the bill, and they have expressed a willingness to vote for it if allowed to submit the most unimportant amendments. It is well understood what their object is. It is, sir, to kill the bill.

Now, while the bill may be made possibly more perfect in some particulars, it is a measure of such vast consequence to the American people, and so understood, that I cannot, for one, assume the responsibility of allowing it to be amended in the House so as to send it back to the Senate, there to sleep the sleep of death. I cannot consent to yield the floor for the purpose of giving an opportunity to any gentleman to move an amendment. I concede that some amendment might be made that would be beneficial to the bill, but the gentlemen who desire in good faith to offer amendments can, after this bill has been passed, present them and have them adopted in a supplemental proposition, which, if defeated at this session of Congress, may be adopted at the next session.

Mr. HALE. I inquire of the chairman of the Committee on the Post Office and Post Roads whether we are to understand from his remarks he proposes to bring this bill to a vote without any opportunity for discussion or amendment of any kind whatever.

Mr. ALLEY. I have stated that I intend to bring this bill to a vote without yielding the floor to the enemies of the bill to propose amendments which I know are sure to kill it. I do not propose to deny to any gentleman who desires to discuss the bill in good faith opportunity to do so; but at this late period of the session we cannot discuss it as fully as I would like.

Mr. HALE. I wish to discuss this bill, but I cannot say now whether I will discuss it in good faith or not, but I have never been in the habit of discussing measures in any other.

Mr. ALLEY. To be sure not. This bill is important to the interests of the American people; but it is more important now than at any other period, for the reason that nearly all the telegraph companies of the country have recently been consolidated into one. This company now represents a capital of nearly $41,000,000. It is the most gigantic monopoly in this country if not in the world. It has in its hands nearly all the telegraphic lines within its control in the country, and the American people are substantially subjected to its dictum in this regard. We know the power of the telegraph and how influential it may be in affecting the destinies of subordinate interests and the prosperity of the nation. Then I think the House will agree with me that under such circumstances we ought to pass the bill at once and protect the rights and interests of the people. When I say this consolidated company is a great monopoly I do not mean in any invidious sense. The members of the company whom I know are gentlemen of high character and respectability, and I do not doubt they will conduct the affairs of this company, perhaps, as well as any other gentlemen would who are intrusted with the same amount of power and responsibility.

Now, Mr. Speaker, it was my fortune, as is well known to you, to have had something to do with the enactment of the telegraph bill which established telegraphic communication with the Pacific coast, and with the single exception of their conduct in relation to conveying telegrams over that line, I have nothing to say against them in particular. But I do say here, and I defy contradiction, that the company have not acted in good faith to this Government so far as its promises were concerned. In reference to its service upon that line and the requirements of the bill which we passed in 1860 granting them great privileges and subsidies, they were required to charge but three dollars a message of ten words from the Missouri river, I think, to the State line of California. They accepted the act with the understanding and the promise, so far as they could make such a promise at that time, that four dollars a message of ten words was all that should be charged from St. Louis, or rather, I think, from Washington to San Francisco. Now, what are the facts? They neither complied with the spirit or letter of the law, inasmuch as they charge nearly eight dollars for a message from here to San Francisco and to intervening points in Nevada and the distant Territories. They have violated the letter of the law in demanding this exorbitant rate, certainly at the other end of the line, and if I am not mistaken at this end also, in coin. They refuse to receive their pay in the lawful currency of the country. Therefore, I say, they violate the spirit of the law in charging indirectly double what was expected and promised, and the letter of the law in demanding coin.

Mr. Speaker, the capital stock of the Western Union Telegraph Company in May, I think, 1864, was $11,000,000. They watered their stock from eleven to twenty-two millions. This stock in the market at that time, or very soon after, was worth two hundred per cent. Of this I do not complain, but simply wish to show by the statement how necessary it is that we should have competition. Now, sir, such gigantic fortunes as have been made by individuals connected with these telegraph companies have never been witnessed, I believe, anywhere else on the face of the earth by legitimate pursuits.

And can they complain now that the Congress of the United States steps in and gives not an exclusive but a general privilege to any and every company properly chartered under the laws of any State of this Union? An exclusive privilege, Mr. Speaker, was asked for, but the Senate refused it and gave them a general bill, which enables all companies receiving these powers at the hands of any Legislature to construct telegraph lines over military and postal routes of the United States and over the public domain. That is all substantially that this bill grants, and surely it does seem to me in view of the important interests involved, that this House cannot object to granting to American citizens, for such a good purpose, such a trifling boon as this. My colleague on the committee [Mr. FINCK] wishes to say a few words, and I will give way to him for ten minutes.

Mr. FINCK. Mr. Speaker, the condition of my health will prevent me from detaining the House even for the ten minutes which have been yielded to me. There is no man more desirous than myself to oppose anything like a monopoly in this country, nor more disposed to favor and sanction any proper and legitimate measure which may be inaugurated to restrict the monopolies which now exist. But I have been unable to bring my mind to sanction the bill now pending before the House, reported by my colleague, the chairman of the Committee on the Post Office and Post Roads.

The gentleman admits that amendments of some character ought perhaps to be made to the bill. Sir, what we do now ought to be done properly. The bill should at this time be amended. I will not now argue the question whether Congress has the power to authorize the construction of these telegraph lines through the States without the consent of the States. I shall confine the few remarks which I propose to submit to the House to one of a number of objections which I have to the passage of this bill in its present shape. It provides in the first section that any telegraph company now organized, or which may hereafter be organized, shall have certain rights which are conferred by this bill, among which is the right to construct, maintain, and operate their lines of telegraph through and over any portion of the public domain of the United States. I have no doubt as to the authority of Congress to grant that much. But the bill goes on further and proposes to confer the right also to construct such lines of telegraph through the States "over and along any of the military or post roads of the United States which have been or may hereafter be declared such by act of Congress, and over, under, or across the navigable streams or waters of the United States."

Now, what does this bill do? It undertakes to authorize these companies to go into the States and to put down their posts and all the necessary apparatus for the purpose of operating telegraph lines.

Now, I deny that without some provision by which the consent of the land-owners shall be obtained, or by which some remedy shall be provided to the owners of the soil for obtaining compensation for the property appropriated, Congress has any right to do what is proposed by this measure. To whom does the soil belong, or the right of way, on which these post roads and military roads have been established? Certainly, the right is in some individual or company. If the property has been condemned merely for the use of a railroad, it is to be used only for the purpose of such railroad; it is to be operated and used for that single purpose, and the right of way belongs to the company which has condemned or purchased it. It belongs to them to that extent, and when they cease to use it for the purposes for which the land was condemned, when they cease to use and operate it for railroad purposes, the right reverts to the owner of the fee.

But the bill authorizes private property to be taken and used by these telegraph companies. That property belongs to some person or some company, and you cannot by this enactment give to the telegraph companies the right to use this particular property, the right of way, or the soil without making some provision by which the owners of the right of way or the owners of the soil shall receive just compensation for the property taken.

Now, sir, if there were any provision in the bill authorizing some legal way by which to ascertain the value and provide for the payment of the property taken for which compensation is to be made, it would remove one of the objections which I have to this bill. Every one knows that private property cannot be taken in this way without just compensation.

If we pass this bill and authorize these companies to construct these telegraphic lines through the States, there will likely occur controversies between the State authorities and this legislation of the Federal Government.

It seems to me that my colleague, the chairman of the committee, ought not to be so rigid in adhering to the declaration he made this morning, that he would not allow any opportunity to amend the bill. Let the bill be perfected. I should like to vote for some proper measure by which we might organize a system which would tend to check the monopoly which now exists in the telegraphic system of the country. But I do not believe that this bill is constitutional. There are other objections to the bill which I cannot now discuss, but for the reasons I have stated I must oppose its passage.

Mr. ALLEY. I now yield ten minutes to the gentleman from New York, [Mr. HALE.]

Mr. HALE. Mr. Speaker, the chairman of the Committee on the Post Office and Post Roads stated an unquestionable fact when he stated that this was a bill of very great importance. I sincerely trust that this House will not pass upon it under the pressure of the previous question with only the limited debate which the morning hour of one day affords. I propose now simply to specify one or two objections to this bill which strike me as vital. I cannot properly discuss them in the ten minutes that the gentleman has accorded me, and which is all that he could give me of the time allotted to him. Before entering, however, upon these points, let me say that the gentleman from Massachusetts intimates that this bill is a measure in behalf of freedom of operations to individuals and companies to prevent the engrossment by a great monopoly of all the telegraphic lines within the United States.

Now, sir, if by that the gentleman from Massachusetts [Mr. ALLEY] means to convey the idea that those who oppose this bill here are the advocates of a monopoly, are for sustaining the rights of a single corporation or of any set of individuals at the expense of the rights of the people of the Republic, then for one I most emphatically disclaim and repel any such idea. I have never raised my voice and never cast a vote upon this floor in favor of chartered exclusive rights to the prejudice of the general rights of the community, and I trust I never shall.

The first objection that exists to this bill has been already discussed by the gentleman from Ohio, [Mr. FINCK], a member of the Committee on the Post Office and Post Roads, and therefore I need add nothing to what he has said. The objection is conclusive, and I challenge any man to dispute the positions he has taken. This bill provides that telegraphic companies may enter upon and occupy private property for their purposes without making any compensation whatever. Sir, that provision is in direct conflict with that provision of the Constitution which provides that private property shall not be taken for public use except upon just compensation. I will not go over that ground, but simply ask the House not to put itself in the position of framing a bill containing an unconstitutional provision merely for the reason that it may be remedied by the courts, which will declare that provision to be a nullity.

Another provision in this bill strikes me as objectionable, highly objectionable, on another ground; that is, on the ground that it goes to take away the general rights of the people and give them over into the hands of a monopoly, and that, too, a monopoly not of our own creation and not of our own regulation. I fasten upon this bill the charge that it has been framed in the interests of foreign corporations claiming exclusive rights; that it is designed and tends directly to put into the hands of a corporation created by a foreign Government the power of holding exclusive communication between its shores and the shores of this country. Look at it. This bill provides that telegraphic wires may be laid "over, under, or across the navigable streams or waters of the United States" by any company.

The "navigable waters of the United States" include a marine league from the shore of the ocean. Take a single instance. The government of Cuba has chartered a telegraphic company and given to them exclusive rights upon the shores of Cuba, to connect with the shores of the United States. No American company can connect with the shores of Cuba. Under this bill any company, being authorized to go outside of the marine league, may there enter into an agreement with the Cuban company by which they will have the exclusive privilege of connecting with Cuba, of telegraphic communication with Cuba, and every other company is by the terms of this bill cut off from any such communication. And why? Simply because so long as the power rests with Cuba to say with whom they will connect when they get outside of the marine league, the moment we have given to any company the right to go across that marine league they have nothing to do but to make that connection and then the Cuban company has the monopoly.

On the other hand, if we should pass such a bill as we ought to pass, one which shall provide that no company shall be permitted to form a connection across our marine league until the Government of the country with which it connects gives to all American companies the same privileges upon their shores, we then keep the matter entirely in our own hands. Nothing short of that legislation will do it. And until we do that this bill itself does create the greatest monopoly and confers the greatest exclusive privilege upon a foreign corporation, entirely free from our control. There are other objections to this bill, which in the brief time allowed me I shall have no opportunity to notice. But the two objections to which I have referred, the one the want of constitutional power on our part to pass this bill, the other the giving exclusive privileges to a foreign corporation, are or should be conclusive against it.

Mr. THAYER. I would like to ask the gentleman from New York what section of the bill proposes to grant power to take and use private property without compensation.

Mr. HALE. I will answer the gentleman. It is provided in the first section that—

Any telegraph company now organized or which may hereafter be organized under the laws of any State in this Union shall have the right to construct, maintain, and operate lines of telegraph through and over any portion of the public domain of the United States, over and along any military or post roads of the United States which have been or may hereafter be declared such by act of Congress.

"Post roads of the United States" include as well public highways which have been declared post roads as railroads. In either case there is a right of private property involved. In the case of a public highway, the easement, the servitude of travel, is in the public, while the right to the soil is in the private individual through whose land it passes; and you have no more right to authorize a telegraph company to erect poles and stretch a wire over a highway that crosses my land without compensation to me, than you have to authorize the company, without making compensation, to build a house upon my farm. In the case of a railroad the company generally owns the fee, but will any gentleman contend that Congress has the right to authorize a telegraph company to make their excavations and erect their structures on the land of a railroad without compensation? All this the bill proposes to do.

Mr. THAYER. Does the gentleman think that any practical injury could result to anybody from carrying a telegraph wire along the public highway, or that anybody's rights would be materially injured by such an act?

Mr. HALE. The gentleman will allow me to say that it is not a question whether rights are "materially injured." Does the gentleman from Pennsylvania mean to say that because it would be no material injury to me the Government has a right to authorize him to cross my farm and set up telegraph poles upon my land without making compensation to me? I ask him that question. His answer to that will be my answer to his inquiry.

Mr. THAYER. I do not understand that the bill gives the right to any company to cross anybody's farm. It simply gives to the companies the right to carry their wires along the public roads or highways. If there be in that any injury at all it is what lawyers call damnum absque injuria.

Mr. HALE. Mr. Speaker, where a highway passes through my farm, as I have before said, the soil of that highway, subject to the public servitude of travel, is as absolutely mine as any right of mine in the world; and it strikes me that the gentleman from Pennsylvania makes a great mistake when he says that a violation of this right is damnum absque injuria, and that Congress may authorize him to walk across my land if I choose to say that I prefer his footsteps shall not press it. Whether there be any injuria or not, there is in such a case a damnum which Congress has no power to impose upon me.

The SPEAKER. The ten minutes of the gentleman from New York have expired.

Mr. ALLEY. Mr. Speaker, in the several speeches which have been made by gentlemen opposed to this bill no one of them has ventured to raise his voice in opposition to the merits of the measure. Every gentleman with whom I have conversed upon the subject has been forced to admit that it is a bill of great merit, that it proposes to remedy a great and increasing evil, the power to remedy which ought to exist somewhere—

Mr. HOTCHKISS. If the gentleman will allow me, I desire to inquire what is the present value of the stock of the Western Union Telegraph Company.

Mr. ALLEY. The present value is fifty-three dollars per share, the par value being $100.

Mr. HOTCHKISS. It has been, I understand, $200.

Mr. ALLEY. That was before the stock was watered. A gentleman near me says that it has been watered sixteen times. In this he is mistaken. It has not been watered so many times as that; but I cannot say how many times it has been.

Mr. HOTCHKISS. Will the gentleman from Massachusetts give an opportunity for gentlemen to "raise their voices in opposition to the bill?"

The SPEAKER. Does the gentleman from Massachusetts yield to the gentleman from New York, [Mr. HOTCHKISS?]

Mr. ALLEY. I do not, unless the gentleman wants to ask a question.

Mr. HOTCHKISS. I have asked a question.

Mr. ALLEY. And I am going to answer it. The gentleman asks me what is the present value of the stock of the Western Union Telegraph Company.

Mr. HOTCHKISS. The gentleman has answered that question. My other question was whether the gentleman would give to other gentlemen an opportunity "to raise their voices in opposition to this bill."

Mr. ALLEY. I understand full well the purpose of certain gentlemen with regard to this bill—

Mr. HOTCHKISS. Will the gentleman answer my question?

Mr. ALLEY. I am going to answer the gentleman's question in my own way. If he will be quiet he will get my answer.

Mr. HOTCHKISS. Will the gentleman answer the question directly, without any condition about my being quiet?

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Massachusetts is entitled to the floor; and the gentleman from New York is not in order.

Mr. ALLEY. I will answer the gentleman, but I deny his right or the right of any other gentleman upon this floor to tell me how I shall answer a question. If the gentleman will hear me I will answer his question.

Mr. HOTCHKISS. If you do not give the privilege of discussing the matter you should not say no man dares question its propriety.

Mr. ALLEY. I would give every gentleman an opportunity to be heard fully on this question if we had the time. Nothing would afford me more satisfaction than to go into the history of this company from the beginning to the end. I could a tale unfold in regard to telegraph companies which would not be disputed here or anywhere else, and which I am sure would secure the vote of every member of this House on this bill; unless, perhaps, some might be deterred by what they regard as constitutional objections, which, of course, I respect. So far as the constitutional question is concerned, sir, I have nothing to say. I am no lawyer. I give gentlemen credit for being sincere and conscientious in their objections on constitutional grounds; and I believe no gentleman here if he was thoroughly informed upon the subject would find it in his heart to oppose the passage of this bill on its merits outside of any constitutional question. But I have only to say in reference to the constitutional points raised, that the most eminent lawyers of Congress or with whom I consulted on the bill say that it is perfectly constitutional and right in all of its parts. All these points and all these objections have been raised in the committee as well as upon this floor, and have been fully considered. I expected most earnest opposition to this bill. I understand what appliances have been resorted to; I know that the chief manager of this great monopoly has been here upon the floor of this House to-day calling members from their seats and soliciting their aid in opposition to this bill.

If I had time I think I could show on the merits of this measure that the interests of the American people imperatively demand its passage. But I have not time to go into that at any great length, but I trust I have said sufficient to obtain the sanction of this House to this measure, and have only to say in regard to the constitutional question, if this great Government and the people of this country are in the hands of a few individuals in regard to the use of the telegraph, from whom there is no escape, then God help the nation! Yet with such important interests at stake, if we are to be prevented from exercising our rights in this matter because of constitutional impediments, it seems to me we are in a bad way.

Mr. KASSON. I inquire whether the bill cannot be improved by amendment.

Mr. ALLEY. I know the bill can be improved in some particulars. Of that I have no doubt. But I will say that the bill was thoroughly matured by an able committee of the Senate. It was reported to the Senate and passed by that body after an elaborate discussion, and came to this House. I have taken great pains to become satisfied in regard to the points raised, and have consulted some of the most eminent lawyers in Congress, who, without a single exception, save one, I believe, are of the opinion that the bill is constitutional.

Mr. KASSON. The gentleman does not understand me. The difficulty I have is a practical one. The bill does not reserve to the United States the right to regulate the tariff of charges, which I think ought to be done. There is nothing to prevent the company acting under this bill with the old monopoly. We are now paying an extravagant and unprecedented rate of duty for telegraphing. It should be put in connection with the Post Office Department as far as possible. To that I agree. But we should fix the maximum rates the company should charge. In view of these amendments I ask my friend whether he thinks the mysterious influences of which he has spoken, but of which I am fortunately ignorant, will have changed the opinion of the Senate since they passed this bill, if we send it back to them.

Mr. ALLEY. While I do not say any improper influence has been or will be brought to bear upon the Senate, still I believe the bill will be lost if we send it back to them, and with that strong conviction I should be recreant to my convictions of duty thus to jeopardize its passage.

Mr. WASHBURN, of Illinois. I have not looked at this bill before this morning, but if it will tend in any way to break up the present stupendous monopoly I am for it. It must be apparent to every member that this telegraph monopoly has become oppressive to the people and they ought not to be called upon to bear it any longer. The gentleman says it is an outrage. They are combining, confederating, and consolidating until it seems that they have almost every telegraph line within their clutches; they are taxing the people to a most enormous extent; and now, if this bill will in any way tend to break down that monopoly, I am for it. The gentleman from Massachusetts [Mr. ALLEY] is pretty sound on this question of telegraph monopoly—I wish he was equally sound on some other questions which may come up here—and I desire to carry out the ideas which the gentleman has expressed. Now, the third section contains a very important provision. I do not think it goes far enough. It is intended to prevent the transfer of the "privileges hereby granted."

Mr. HALE. As the gentleman has entered freshly into this case, I wish to ask him if in his eager haste to break down telegraph monopolies he is willing to violate the Constitution by taking private property without compensation, and whether he is willing to sacrifice an American monopoly for the benefit of a foreign monopoly.

Mr. WASHBURN, of Illinois. I do not propose to violate the Constitution or build up any monopoly, as the gentleman suggests, at all; but I have an amendment that I wish to propose to this bill.

Mr. HALE. You cannot do it; the gentleman from Massachusetts will not let you.

Mr. WASHBURN, of Illinois. Oh, I think he will. I was calling the gentleman's attention to an amendment which I think he will agree to. I have no fear that it will not be concurred in by the Senate or that they will not pass the bill during the present session. I want a provision incorporated by which, in case the company undertake to sell out their rights, this act shall be repealed. I propose to amend the third section, which provides "that the rights and privileges hereby granted shall not be transferred by said company to any other corporation, association, or person without the consent of Congress," by adding these words, "and any such transfer, either direct or indirect or under any color or pretense whatever, shall operate as a repeal of this act."

Mr. ALLEY. I object to the amendment and call the previous question.

Mr. JOHNSON. I appeal to my colleague on the committee.

Mr. ALLEY. I decline to yield.

Mr. JOHNSON. I must say this is a violation of faith on the part of the chairman of the committee.

Mr. ASHLEY, of Ohio. The chairman of the committee can yield to the gentleman after the previous question is seconded.

Mr. JOHNSON. We were assured we would have an opportunity to debate it. I did not want to occupy more than ten minutes.

On seconding the demand for the previous question no quorum voted.

Tellers were ordered; and the Speaker appointed Messrs. ALLEY and FINCK.

The House divided; and the tellers reported—ayes 51, noes 45.

So the previous question was seconded.

Mr. HALE. On ordering the main question I demand the yeas and nays.

The yeas and nays were ordered.

The question being taken on ordering the main question, it was decided in the affirmative—yeas 74, nays 60, not voting 48; as follows:

YEAS—Messrs. Alley, Allison, Ames, Anderson, Delos R. Ashley, James M. Ashley, Banks, Barker, Baxter, Bidwell, Bingham, Boutwell, Buckland, Bundy, Reader W. So the main question was ordered; and under the operation thereof the bill was ordered to be engrossed and read a third time.

Mr. FINCK. Is it in order to move to recommit?

The SPEAKER. Not pending the operation of the previous question.

The bill being engrossed was accordingly read the third time.

Mr. ALLEY. I demand the previous question on the passage.

Mr. HALE. I move to lay the bill on the table, and on that I demand the yeas and nays.

Mr. JOHNSON. I would like to make a motion to postpone it till December next.

The SPEAKER. The motion to lay on the table has priority.

Mr. HALE. I will withdraw the motion to lay on the table, and will call the yeas and nays on the passage.

Mr. JOHNSON. Will the chairman of the committee yield for a motion to postpone?

Mr. ALLEY. I decline to yield for that purpose.

The previous question was seconded.

Mr. FINCK. Is it not always in order, Mr. Speaker, to postpone to a day certain?

The SPEAKER. It is not. The previous question has priority of it, also the motion to lay on the table. The motion to postpone to a day certain is fourth on the list.

The main question was ordered on the passage of the bill.

Mr. HALE. I demand the yeas and nays on the passage.

The yeas and nays were ordered.

The question being taken on the passage of the bill, it was decided in the affirmative—yeas 72, nays 62, not voting 48; as follows:

YEAS—Messrs. Alley, Allison, Ames, Anderson, Delos R. Ashley, James M. Ashley, Baker, Banks, Barker, Baxter, Bidwell, Bingham, Buckland, Bundy, Reader W. Wilson, and Winfield—48.

So the bill was passed.

After the roll-call had commenced,

Mr. JOHNSON said: I was told by the chairman of the committee that he would give me a part of his time.

The SPEAKER. The roll-call has commenced.

The result having been announced as above recorded,

Mr. ALLEY moved to reconsider the vote by which the bill was passed; and also moved to lay the motion to reconsider upon the table.

Mr. HALE. On the latter motion I demand the yeas and nays.

The yeas and nays were not ordered.

The motion to lay on the table was agreed to.

FAIR FOR ORPHANS' HOME.

The SPEAKER, by unanimous consent, laid before the House the following communication:

WASHINGTON, July 11, 1866,

To the honorable the members of the House of Representatives of the United States Congress:

The directors of the National Soldiers' and Sailors' Orphan Home take the liberty to invite your honorable body to honor the fair by your presence on the occasion of its final close, and the presentation of the articles voted for the successful candidates, on Thursday evening, the 12th instant, at nine o'clock.

Very respectfully, Mrs. J. C. CARLISLE, Secretary.

ASSISTANT HOUSE STENOGRAPHER.

Mr. ROLLINS. I ask unanimous consent to report back the following resolution from the Committee of Accounts:

Resolved, That the Speaker be authorized to appoint a competent stenographer as assistant official reporter to the committees of the House, who shall be paid out of the contingent fund, commencing the 1st of June, 1866, the same compensation paid to the official reporter, and whose term of service shall expire March 4, 1867.

Mr. HALE. I object to that, unless there is opportunity for discussion and amendment.

Mr. ROLLINS. Very well. I will withdraw it.

GERMAN TARGET ASSOCIATION.

Mr. ASHLEY, of Ohio, by unanimous consent, introduced a bill to incorporate the German Target Association of the city of Washington; which was read a first and second time and referred to the Committee for the District of Columbia.

PACIFIC RAILROAD BONDS.

Mr. PRICE, by unanimous consent, introduced a bill to authorize the issue of certain bonds in denominations greater than $100; which was read a first and second time and referred to the Committee on the Pacific Railroad.

CALIFORNIA LAND TITLES.

Mr. BIDWELL. I ask to take up from the Speaker's table Senate bill No. 343, to quiet land titles in California, with the action of the Senate on the amendments of the House thereto.

No objection was made.

Mr. BIDWELL. The Senate have agreed to all the amendments of the House to this bill except the tenth. I move that the House recede from that amendment.

The tenth amendment of the House, disagreed to by the Senate, was read as follows:

Add to section nine, at the end of the bill, the following proviso:

Provided, however, That from decrees of the district courts, as aforesaid, made after July 1, 1865, and prior to the passage of this act, an appeal may be taken to the United States circuit court for the State of California within one year from the approval of this act; Provided, That in any such case in which an appeal may be taken under the provisions of this section the said circuit court shall not be precluded by the terms of the decree of confirmation, or by reason of any clerical mistake therein, from determining the boundaries of the land claimed in accordance with the original grant and the real justice and merits of the case.

Mr. JULIAN. That is an amendment which was agreed to by the Committee on Public Lands, and I can see no objection to it. I hope the House will not agree to the motion to recede from that amendment, but will appoint a committee of conference to arrange the difference between the two Houses.

Mr. BIDWELL. The effect of the amendment is to allow the circuit court to review and open a case which has been confirmed by the Supreme Court. We think that is wrong. The whole object of this bill is to quiet land titles in our State, and I hope the House will recede from its amendment.

Mr. JULIAN. I want to ask the gentleman from California why that amendment was adopted.

Mr. PAINE. This matter seems to be taking up some time. I must resume the floor.

The SPEAKER. The Chair thinks the amendment is before the House.

Mr. JULIAN. I do not propose to detain the House at all.

Mr. BIDWELL. I have moved that the House recede from its amendment.

Mr. JULIAN. I move that the House insist on its amendment and ask a committee of conference. I wish to make a simple statement to the House. The difficulty arises from a clerical error in the records of the Supreme Court, affecting large landed interests. The boundaries of a tract described were impossible boundaries; they did not inclose the land at all; and the object of this amendment is to cover that case and allow the Supreme Court on appeal, to correct that clerical error in the record of the court below; and there can be no objection to it.

Mr. HIGBY. What case is that?

Mr. JULIAN. I have the statement from gentlemen from California, and upon their statement the committee adopted this amendment.

Mr. PAINE. I yielded the floor to the gentleman from California with the express stipulation that he should only hold it for five minutes, and if he has any parliamentary right to hold it longer, it is due to me that he should withdraw his motion. Personally I would be perfectly willing to give him all the time he asks, but there is another question of privilege behind mine, and the gentlemen who have charge of it insist that I either go on now or yield to them.

Mr. BIDWELL. I have not taken up any time, and I merely ask a vote.

Mr. WASHBURN, of Illinois. I desire to move to postpone the consideration of this question until to-morrow morning.

Mr. BIDWELL. I withdraw my request.

The bill was therefore returned to the Speaker's table.

ELECTION CONTEST—AGAIN.

The House then proceeded to the consideration of the following resolution reported by Mr. PAINE from the Committee of Elections:

Resolved, That Hon. John L. Dawson is entitled to retain his seat as Representative in the Thirty-Ninth Congress from the twenty-first district of the State of Pennsylvania.

Mr. PAINE. I yield to my colleague on the committee from Pennsylvania [Mr. SCOFIELD] to move an amendment for the resolution reported by the committee.

Mr. SCOFIELD. I submit the following amendment to the resolution reported by the Committee of Elections:

Resolved, That Smith Fuller is entitled to a seat as a Representative in the Thirty-Ninth Congress from the twenty-first district of Pennsylvania.

Mr. PAINE addressed the House for an hour. [His remarks will be found in the Appendix.]

Mr. SCOTFIELD obtained the floor.

Mr. PAINE. I have not yet commenced my argument in this case.

Mr. INGERSOLL. Is it in order to move to extend the time of the gentleman from Wisconsin?

Mr. SCOTFIELD. I have the floor, I believe.

Mr. INGERSOLL. I supposed I made my motion in time.

Mr. SCOTFIELD. I obtained the floor, and object to being taken off it without my consent. I was going on to say that I had no objection to the gentleman from Wisconsin going on and finishing his speech if the House is willing that he shall do so. I was going to ask the House to grant him an opportunity to continue his speech.

Mr. PAINE. I do not ask any such privilege. I shall have an opportunity to close this debate.

Mr. SPALDING. I desire to ask the gentleman from Pennsylvania if there is any probability that a vote will be taken on this question this evening.

Mr. SCOTFIELD. I know nothing about it. I shall only occupy ten or fifteen minutes.

Mr. SPALDING. I wish to give notice that as soon as this case is closed I shall call up the report of the select committee on the recent breach of privilege.

Mr. SCOTFIELD. Mr. Speaker, this is a question which involves, to some extent, the right of soldiers of Pennsylvania to vote. We had before us here a question involving the right of the soldiers of Michigan to vote, in the early part of this session. But this is not a case like that. That depended upon the constitution of the State; but when it was ascertained in Pennsylvania that the soldiers had no right to vote the great anxiety of the public to extend to them this high privilege induced them to amend their constitution, and, under the amended constitution, the Legislature passed an act providing the place, manner, and form under which the soldiers should cast their votes.

The law of Pennsylvania as it stood prior to the passage of that act, as respected the home vote, under the decisions of our courts, waived almost all of what may be termed technicalities in the returns, and determined that where ever a return was sufficiently intelligible to be understood by the judges who were to act upon the case, the voters' will should be registered. But for fear that even that little remnant of formality might not be understood by our soldiers distant in the field and in the camp, the Legislature of Pennsylvania further provided that "no mere informalities in the manner of carrying out or executing any of the provisions of the act should invalidate any election held under the same or the returns thereof," using the word "return," as a Legislature is always bound to do it, in a technical sense.

Now, sir, I would not say a single word about this case but for one thing. I know the fairness and industry of my colleagues upon the Committee of Elections. I know the vast amount of labor that is imposed upon them, and I admire the impartiality with which they have attempted to discharge their duty. I would not, for the mere sake of determining whether my friend in front of me [Mr. Dawson] should occupy the seat, or the contestant outside [Mr. Fuller] should occupy it, say a single word. We have majority enough now, and there is no need of another vote. But I believe the committee have done a great wrong to the Legislature and soldiers of Pennsylvania in the construction which they have given our laws. Our courts have construed our laws for home voting, where we have experienced and intelligent clerks to perform the duties, to mean simply that you shall have an intelligible return, covering, as some here hold, even the oath of office, under presumption that the officers have discharged their duties and taken the oath when it is not legally certified. But to make the soldiers doubly sure of their votes the Legislature passed this act, in addition to our judicial decisions, providing that no mere informality or omission of form should set aside the soldiers' return. They designed to make allowance for the haste, the inconvenience, and inexperience of the camp, and give effect at home to the absent warrior's vote, however informally cast. I am unwilling to see this House, even upon the recommendation of the committee, pass sentence of disfranchisement upon these soldiers and of condemnation upon the law.

The majority of the committee have made two mistakes: one of law, in the construction of the soldiers' voting act; and the other of fact, in the rejection of votes, even according to their own wrong construction of that law. The correction of either their mistake of law or their mistake of fact will give the contestant the seat. Their mistake in law consists in construing the soldiers' voting act out of existence. It amounts to a judicial repeal of the sections that waive informalities and omissions. Instead of giving the soldier greater latitude than is given to the clerk at home, they have given him less. They not only require that the returns must be perfect, but even that the oaths take by the officers must be drawn up in full, and signed and certified to by the person that administers them, and some of the committee go further than this, and demand a perfect tally-list and poll-book in addition. By this construction they exclude from the count a large number of soldiers' votes; some for each candidate, to be sure, but between thirty and forty more of those cast for Mr. Fuller than for Mr. Dawson. This changes the majority of 16 for Mr. Fuller into a majority of 15 for Mr. Dawson. But even under this erroneous construction of the law Fuller would still have a majority of 2 if they had not committed another error in the application of their own rule to the facts.

I will now briefly call the attention of the House to the mistakes in fact. I am not going to refer to them; only enough to show that their majority of 15 for Dawson should be a majority of 2 for Fuller, if they would only follow their own bad rule of construction. The gentleman from Wisconsin [Mr. PAINE] admits that if we count all the votes that were returned, leaving out of question the formalities which are supposed to be wanting, the contestant has a majority of 16 votes.

Mr. PAINE. I admit just this: that if you count all the votes that appear upon the papers presented to us by the contestant, and which he calls "returns," then he has a majority of 16 votes. But I do not admit that votes enough were ever returned from military precincts, either to the prothonotary's office in Pennsylvania, or to the office of the secretary of the Commonwealth, to give the contestant a majority of 16. I do not know how that is; but I do know that no proof of anything of the kind has ever been made to the committee.

Mr. SCOTFIELD. The gentleman from Wisconsin reasserts his admission instead of retracting it. If all the returns, informal and otherwise, are to be counted, the contestant, as he states, has a majority of 16 votes. But when you come to apply the technical rules, which to some extent the gentleman from Wisconsin indorses, and which I believe the chairman of the committee [Mr. DAWES] indorses to a greater extent—for he is a great admirer of forms—and to count these votes in accordance with them, then you exclude thirty or forty more for the contestant than you do for the sitting member.

Mr. PAINE. I beg the gentleman to allow me to interrupt him for one moment.

Mr. SCOTFIELD. There are two or three gentlemen who are intending to reply to me, and I only want ten minutes in all. However, if it is only for a question, I will yield.

Mr. PAINE. That is all I want; I do not want to make a speech. Will the gentleman be kind enough to tell this House whether he regards the return in the case of Camp Hamilton as anything upon which this House can act?

Mr. SCOTFIELD. I shall not reply to the gentleman just now by giving him an answer about Camp Hamilton, because votes from other camps are in issue now.

Mr. PAINE. Will the gentleman allow me to say to this House that the return in the case of Camp Hamilton is nothing but the oaths and the certificates of oaths, without any poll-book, tally-list, or anything to show how the votes were cast?

Mr. SCOTFIELD. Is it counted or not?

Mr. PAINE. The gentleman, I understand, insists that it shall be counted.

Mr. SCOTFIELD. No, sir; I do not insist upon any such thing. If the gentleman will compose his nerves and, as he has spoken an hour, listen to me for ten minutes he will probably see what I do propose to count and what I do not. I am only stating now that after the votes which have been returned formally and informally have been counted the contestant has a majority of 16; and by counting out a portion of those votes, taking from the list in favor of the contestant 30 or 40 more than they do from the sitting member, they give him a majority of 15. That is, they count off the 16 majority that the contestant has, making them even, and then they count off 15 more from the contestant, leaving the sitting member 15 ahead.

Now, sir, I am going to content myself with taking only the three returns which the gentleman from Wisconsin has discussed, and I submit to the House whether, even under their construction of the law of Pennsylvania—wrong as that construction is, unjust as it is to the soldiers and to the Legislature of our State—the committee have not made sufficient mistakes in the application of their own rule to give the contestant the seat.

Company A, one hundred and fifty-fifth regiment, the gentleman from Wisconsin himself admits, ought to be counted. There are 7 votes for Fuller. He contends, however, that the report made some time ago in the case of Koontz vs. Coffroth by the majority of that committee, contains a few words which are adverse to the counting of those votes. I deny that even that had precedent can justify the exclusion. The gentleman cannot lean even upon that decision, wrong as it is, because in that case it was only the certificates of oaths that were wanting. If there is any phraseology employed by the majority of the committee which goes further than the facts, it is not warranted by the case. It is what we call obiter dictum, and if it were contained in the decision of a court, would not be regarded as of binding force.

If gentlemen will take the large book, called "No. 2," and turn to pages 59 and 60, they will find a full return of company A, one hundred and fifty-fifth regiment, and then below it the oaths taken by the officers and the certificate of the oaths. It was the absence of the certificate of oaths, in the case to which the gentleman has referred, that caused the exclusion of the soldiers' votes. Now, sir, before we had adopted in Pennsylvania the law which waives formalities in favor of the soldier the return would have been counted by any court in our State under the old law, which did not waive formalities at all. That question has been decided over and over again; and the decisions of Pennsylvania courts on this question were presented to the committee. Thus, sir, there are 7 votes which the gentleman from Wisconsin concedes should be subtracted from the 15, leaving the sitting member only 8 according to his own count.

Now, sir, take the votes returned from Lincoln hospital. The majority of the committee occupy two pages of the report in the endeavor to show that the votes returned from Lincoln hospital should not be counted. It would, in my humble judgment, take many more pages of even foggier reasoning than we have here to convince a man of ordinary understanding that the votes returned from Lincoln hospital should be excluded for the reason given by the committee; and I am not surprised, therefore, that they occupy two pages of this brief report to deprive seven soldiers at Lincoln hospital of their votes. The officers of that hospital held the election and received, as they were authorized by the soldiers' voting act to receive, the votes of that congressional district. Two of the voters were from Fayette county, five from Indiana county, and eight, I believe, from Westmoreland county. When the officers had gone through with the election, they made up the papers in due form and sent them to the prothonotary of Westmoreland county, because they could not at the same time send them also to Indiana and Fayette counties. The prothonotary of Westmoreland county certifies to those 15 votes, five from Indiana county, two from Fayette, and eight from Westmoreland. The committee say, "We will count the 8 votes from Westmoreland county; but inasmuch as the prothonotary of that county had no right to certify to the votes of the other two counties, we will not count them."

The committee conclude their very cunning argument by generously saying:

"But there is another instrument of proof—the certified transcript of the secretary of the Commonwealth, who is the lawful depository of military returns for every county in the State. This is not produced in the present case, and only eight of the votes contained in this return can be counted."

Sir, I take issue with the committee on this point. I say that this certified transcript was produced. It was presented in this House and was by the House referred to the committee. Let me state the evidence upon which I come to this conclusion. All these various documents which were presented, numbering nearly a hundred I believe, were numbered in regular order with red ink. The transcript for Lincoln hospital was numbered sixty-four. All the numbers up to sixty-three, inclusive, are in the possession of the committee. No. 64 is missing. Then we find No. 65, and all the others following in regular order.

Mr. PAINE. By whom were they numbered?

Mr. SCOFIELD. I will not say by whom they were numbered, because I do not know. But they were all so numbered, and the gentleman will not deny it.

Mr. PAINE. I would like to make a single statement just here. I think that from the remarks of the gentleman the House will not understand the fact correctly.

Mr. SCOFIELD. I am going to make the House understand it, if the gentleman will give me a chance. This is an intelligent House, and the gentleman from Wisconsin must not think that he is the only man who can get an idea into the heads of the members of this House. [Laughter.] If members will only give me half the attention they gave the gentleman from Wisconsin, I believe I can make them understand the matter.

I was stating the evidence upon which I base my conclusion that this return was referred to that committee and somehow lost—unintentionally of course. The different records were found, numbered in regular order up to sixty-three; No. 64 was missing; and then the records were found again numbered in regular order from sixty-five upward. Now, would any one numbering those records omit No. 64? As soon as we learned from the gentleman from Wisconsin, who had the various papers put into his hands for the purpose of preparing the report, that No. 64 was wanting, we telegraphed to the Governor of Pennsylvania, who immediately sent on a duplicate, marking it "duplicate"—showing that another record of the same kind had been sent before. Here it is with the broad seal of our good old Commonwealth and the name of her patriotic Governor upon it. Here, too, is an affidavit showing the loss of the first certificate.

Thus the majority of the committee would deprive of their votes these seven soldiers from Indiana and Fayette counties, who were detained in Lincoln hospital by sickness; and the ground upon which the committee would do this is because the whole return was sent to Westmoreland county, instead of being divided and a part sent to Westmoreland, a part to Indiana, and a part to Fayette—a perfect impossibility. Counting these seven votes, as they justly ought to be counted, for the contestant, we leave the sitting member with a majority of one vote according to the report of the committee.

Take next the return from McClellan hospital; and I am only going to refer to those returns the rejection of which the gentleman from Wisconsin seemed to think needed a little bolstering up in advance. McClellan hospital gave 3 votes for the contestant; and if they are allowed, with the 7 from Lincoln hospital and the 7 which the gentleman concedes should be counted from company A, one hundred and fifty-fifth regiment, the contestant has a majority of 2.

Now, what is the difficulty in regard to the vote of McClellan hospital? The majority of the committee admit that they cannot find anything missing in this case. The return is there; the poll-book is there; the tally-list is there. On page 6 of the large book we find all these facts set forth. "But," say the majority of the committee, "the certificate of the oaths is not there. The certificate that the officers who conducted the election were sworn is not there; and, although they state that they were duly sworn, we should have the certificate of the clerk that the oath was taken, giving the form of the oath."

But, sir, after looking a great while the committee, with their extraordinary industry, (to which I am always ready to testify, although the gentleman seems to insinuate that I am a little lazy,) found these oaths on page 380, all in due form, sworn to by the officers, signed by the officers, and certified to by the clerk. They found this at last, and as the gentleman from Wisconsin says, they found it even without the aid of the contestant. What now is the difficulty? They have got all the forms. Why, they say the certificate of oaths was not attached to the other papers; that one is on page 380 in the printed book and the other on page 6. That is all. There is the certificate of oaths signed by the officers of election, certified by the clerk that it was taken by them, but in the printed book they are some three hundred pages apart, and the committee want us to believe that they were never introduced to each other in the camp.

Now, taking the construction that the committee have wrongly given to the soldiers' voting act, blot out that provision of the law of Pennsylvania that says that no informalities shall deprive a soldier of his right to vote, and take the construction that the committee have taken, and you must still count 17 more votes for Fuller. Company A, one hundred and fifty-fifth regiment, cast 7 votes; Lincoln hospital, 7 votes; and McClellan hospital 3 votes, making the 17 that should be counted on the committee's own showing, but which they failed to count. But the gentleman from Wisconsin gave us an elaborate argument to justify the committee, and had the record read to show how many members of the committee they got—five out of nine, three Republicans and two Democrats—to justify the exclusion of these three returns, and then concluded by telling us that he does not assent to it himself, although he wrote the report.

I am reminded that there are 6 more votes that the committee propose to count for Mr. Dawson in case of necessity. In the report they are held as a kind of reserve, neither counted nor cast out. This will compel me to examine a few more of the returns favorable to Mr. Fuller, but rejected by the committee. The 15 set down as sure are already offset by the 17 shown to be improperly rejected. To offset their uncertain 6, I will take Camp Parole, 1; battery H, fourth independent artillery, 4; camp in the field, two hundred and sixth regiment, 2; and Satterlee hospital, 5. Camp

Parole is rejected for informality, while, in point of fact, the papers are perfect. Some of them were printed and are to be found on page 31 of the second book, and the remainder are on file with the clerk of the committee. Battery H was rejected because the oaths taken by the officers were not set out in full, although they certify that they were duly sworn and the tally-papers, list of voters, and returns are all in proper form on pages 6 and 7 of the second book. To "camp in the field" there is even less informality. The oaths here are signed by the officers, but the formal certificate of the officer who administered the oaths is wanting. The fact that the officers took the oath is proved by their own certificate in the caption of the poll-book and by their signatures to the form of oath. These oaths, with the poll-book, list of voters, tally-papers, and return are to be found on page 37 of the third book. In Satterlee hospital the papers are all perfect except that the judges do not sign the form of oath, although the officers who administered them certify that they did so, and the judges themselves certify in the caption of the poll-book that they were duly sworn. Here then are 12 more votes for Mr. Fuller to offset the 6 that the committee contingently propose to count for Mr. Dawson.

One word before I sit down, going back to where I began. I have been attempting to show that these 17 votes should be counted even upon the committee's wrong construction of the law. These alone give the contestant 2 majority. If the 6 doubtful Dawson votes are to be counted, then there are 12 less doubtful Fuller votes that must be also counted, giving him 8 majority. If that construction is to be overruled, as I think it ought to be, then it will be conceded that Mr. Fuller has 16 majority. The difficulty in the way of the gentleman from Wisconsin making a full concession in clear and unequivocal language, I think, is simply this: that he does not want to admit, even for the sake of argument, that these were proper returns, because they lacked the proper forms. But supposing they had the proper forms—and I have attempted to show that they have, the committee themselves being judges—they give Mr. Fuller 2 majority. If you give vitality at all to the soldiers' voting law of Pennsylvania, then you must count the balance of the votes given for both of those gentlemen, and that gives Mr. Fuller 16 majority.

Mr. LAWRENCE, of Pennsylvania. Mr. Speaker, I have a very little to say on this question, but I prefer to say it to-morrow morning, and I will yield to the gentleman from California.

LAND TITLES IN CALIFORNIA.

Mr. BIDWELL. I move the appointment of a committee of conference on the disagreeing votes of the two Houses on Senate bill No. 343, to quiet land titles in California.

The motion was agreed to.

REPORT OF RECONSTRUCTION COMMITTEE.

Mr. LE BLOND. I rise to a privileged question. I find that the report of the joint committee on reconstruction has been brought into the House bound, but incomplete. It was ordered by the House that the whole report be published, together with the testimony. In this volume I find the minority report is not included. I understand the order of the House embraced the minority as well as the majority report. It may be said that the minority report was not brought in simultaneously with the majority report. I grant it. But at the time that the majority report was presented notice was given by a member of the committee that the minority report would be submitted in a short time. That was notice to the House and should have been notice to the Printer, or to the Committee on Printing.

Mr. WASHBURNE, of Illinois. I do not see that this is a question of privilege.

The SPEAKER. It is, but the gentleman must condense his remarks.

Mr. WASHBURNE, of Illinois. Let it be referred to the Committee on Printing to report upon.

Mr. LE BLOND. I do not know who is responsible for this omission, whether the Committee on Printing or the Public Printer, but unless it was a mere accidental omission it certainly merits the censure of this House. It is just as necessary that the minority report should go to the country as the majority.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman has raised his question. The majority report was ordered to be printed on the 8th of June; the minority on the 19th, eleven days afterward. The House subsequently ordered a certain number of copies of the testimony to be printed. It may possibly solve the difficulty if the Committee on Printing examines the matter.

Mr. GRIDER. The report of the majority of the committee is the first matter contained in this volume. The testimony comes after that, although it was taken long before there was a majority report.

The SPEAKER. The Chair will remind the gentleman from Kentucky of the fact of which he must be well aware, as an old member of Congress, that whenever a report with testimony is printed the report always precedes the testimony.

Mr. GRIDER. I desire to state that the minority report was ordered to be printed two days after the majority report was ordered to be printed.

The SPEAKER. The Chair is informed that it was eleven days after.

Mr. GRIDER. After that the chairman of the committee on reconstruction on the part of the House [Mr. STEVENS] moved for the printing of an increased number, and he himself moved that the reports both of the majority and minority should be printed.

Mr. WASHBURN, of Illinois. I must object to further discussion on this matter. If gentlemen opposite want further investigation into this matter let them have it.

Mr. WENTWORTH. Let us have the order to print read.

The SPEAKER. The Chair will state that the Journal shows that the majority report was made upon the 8th of June and the minority report upon the 19th of June.

Mr. GRIDER. I do not want to be misapprehended. I know the reports were so made. But leave was granted to the minority to make a report immediately after the majority report was received.

Mr. LE BLOND. I desire some action on this matter; but as this book has already been published I do not exactly see how any correction can be made now.

The SPEAKER. If any wrong has been done, however, it can be reported to the House.

Mr. WASHBURN, of Illinois. It is due that the facts which appear on the record should be known, and that can only be done by a reference to the Committee on Printing.

Mr. LE BLOND. I move the reference of this matter to a select committee of five, with instructions to ascertain why this book is published in violation of the orders of the House.

Mr. WASHBURN, of Illinois. I object to a select committee, and move that the subject be referred to the Committee on Printing and on that motion I demand the previous question.

Mr. WENTWORTH. What is the question before the House?

The SPEAKER. The point made by the gentleman from Ohio [Mr. LE BLOND] is that an order of the House has not been complied with.

Mr. WENTWORTH. Do I understand the gentleman from Ohio to make such a specific charge as that?

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Ohio has stated at some length the facts upon which he bases the charge.

The previous question was seconded and the main question ordered.

The question was put on the motion of Mr. WASHBURN, of Illinois; and there were—ayes 47, noes 36; no quorum voting.

Tellers were ordered; and Mr. WASHBURN, of Illinois, and Mr. LE BLOND, were appointed.

Mr. LE BLOND. Inasmuch as there is probably no quorum present, I am willing to let this question stand over until to-morrow. I move, therefore, that the House do now adjourn.

The motion was agreed to; and thereupon (at five o'clock and fifteen minutes p. m.) the House adjourned.

PETITIONS, ETC.

The following petitions, &c., were presented under the rule and referred to the appropriate committees: By Mr. ANCONA: The memorial of Charles M. Pott, asking to have the provisions of an act increasing the rates of pensions in certain cases extended to him.

By Mr. HULBURD: The petition of Edward A. Persons for American enrollment and license of the schooner George Harvey, &c., late of Toronto.

By Mr. KELLEY: The petition of Messrs. Daniel S. Clurg, William W. Hall, and William B. Rogers, sureties for J. J. Simpkins, deceased, late collector for the port of Norfolk, Virginia, appealing to the justice of Congress to be released from the payment of a certain amount of money which remained in the hands of the said Simpkins on the breaking out of the late war, which amount was ordered by John Letcher, then Governor of the State of Virginia, to be surrendered to the treasury of that State, the order being communicated to Simpkins through General Benjamin Huger, then commanding the army in and near the city of Norfolk, then in arms against the United States, and having full power to enforce the order.

IN SENATE.

THURSDAY, July 12, 1866.

Prayer by the Chaplain, Rev. E. H. GRAY.

On motion of Mr. WILSON, and by unanimous consent, the reading of the Journal of yesterday was dispensed with.

EXECUTIVE COMMUNICATION.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore laid before the Senate a communication from the Secretary of the Navy, transmitting, in answer to a resolution of the Senate of the 19th of March last, a report from Rear Admiral Charles H. Davis, Superintendent of the Naval Observatory, in relation to various proposed lines for interoceanic canals and railroads between the waters of the Atlantic and the Pacific oceans; which was referred to the Committee on Naval Affairs and ordered to be printed.

Mr. GRIMES subsequently said: I move to reconsider the vote by which the communication from the Navy Department was referred to the Naval Committee. I understand that it is in relation to the routes of transit across the Isthmus of Darien, and was called for by a resolution of the Senator from California, [Mr. CONNESS.] It is not properly a naval question. I suggest that the document be permitted to lie on the table until he shall be in the Senate, and then he can make such a disposition of it as he chooses.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. No objection being made, the vote will be regarded as reconsidered, and the communication will lie on the table.

Mr. CONNESS afterward moved the reference of the communication to the Committee on Post Offices and Post Roads, and the motion was agreed to.

PETITIONS AND MEMORIALS.

Mr. ANTHONY presented the memorial of Richard H. Bryan, a loyal citizen of Stafford county, Virginia, praying for compensation for supplies furnished to the Army during the war; which was referred to the Committee on Claims.

Mr. JOHNSON presented a memorial of dealers in cutlery and hardware in Baltimore, complaining of the excessive duties proposed by the pending tariff bill to be imposed upon imported cutlery and hardware; which was referred to the Committee on Finance.

REPORTS OF COMMITTEES.

Mr. WADE. The Committee on Territories, to whom was referred a bill (H. R. No. 315) for the relief of inhabitants of towns and villages in the Territories of New Mexico and Arizona, have had it under consideration. This bill refers entirely to land titles and to modifying the homestead bill, &c., and does not properly belong to the Committee on Territories. I move that that committee be discharged from it and that it be referred to the Committee on Public Lands.

The motion was agreed to.

Mr. WADE, from the Committee on Territories, to whom was referred the bill (S. No. 404) to regulate the selection of grand and petit jurors in the Territory of Utah, and for other purposes, reported it with amendments.

Mr. POMEROY, from the Committee on Public Lands, to whom was referred the bill (S. No. 420) to revive and continue in force the provisions of an act granting public lands in alternate sections to the State of Mississippi to aid in the construction of railroads in said State, and for other purposes, approved August 11, 1856, reported it without amendment.

Mr. EDMUNDS, from the Committee on Commerce, to whom was referred the bill (S. No. 419) repealing an act entitled "An act repealing certain provisions of law concerning seamen on board public and private vessels of the United States," approved June 28, 1864, reported it without amendment.

Mr. MORGAN, from the Committee on Finance, to whom was referred the bill (H. R. No. 674) to establish additional offices for the assay of gold and silver, and for other purposes, reported it with an amendment.

Mr. STEWART, from the Committee on Public Lands, to whom was referred the bill (S. No. 415) to amend an act entitled "An act to grant the right of preemption to certain settlers on the Socol ranch in the State of California," reported adversely thereon, and moved the indefinite postponement of the bill; which motion was agreed to.

Mr. POLAND. I am instructed by a majority of the Committee on the Judiciary, to whom was referred the joint resolution (S. R. No. 102) construing and giving effect to the joint resolution entitled "A resolution for the relief of the State of Wisconsin," approved July 1, 1864, to report it back with an amendment; and I am also instructed by the same committee, to whom was referred a memorial of the Milwaukee and Rock River Canal Company on that subject, to ask to be discharged from its further consideration.

REGISTERS TO VESSELS.

Mr. HOWE. The Committee on Commerce, to whom was referred the bill (H. R. No. 727) declaratory of an act entitled "An act authorizing the Secretary of the Treasury to issue registers to vessels in certain cases," approved February 10, 1866, have directed me to report it back with two amendments, and to recommend its passage. The bill has to go back to the House of Representatives, and if there be no objection I should like to have it considered now. It is very brief.

By unanimous consent, the bill was considered as in Committee of the Whole. It declares that the act approved on the 10th day of February, in the year 1866, entitled "An act further to regulate the registering of vessels," shall not be deemed or construed to affect or limit the operation of the act approved on the 23d day of December, 1852, entitled "An act authorizing the Secretary of the Treasury to issue registers to vessels in certain cases," or the practice under the same, but it shall be in full force and effect, anything in the act first named to the contrary notwithstanding.

The first amendment reported by the Committee on Commerce was in line five, after the word "act," in the quotation of the title of the act of February 10, 1866, to strike out the word "fourth."

The amendment was agreed to.

The next amendment was in lines ten and eleven to strike out the words "or the practice under the same."

The amendment was agreed to.

The bill was reported to the Senate as amended and the amendments were concurred in.

It was ordered that the amendments be engrossed and the bill be read the third time.

The bill was read the third time and passed. The title of the bill was amended so as to read "An act to regulate the registering of vessels."

DITCHES, ETC., IN PACIFIC STATES.

Mr. STEWART. I am instructed by the Committee on Public Lands, to whom was referred the bill (H. R. No. 365) granting the right of way to ditch and canal owners over the public lands in the States of California, Oregon, and Nevada, to report it back with an amendment and with a recommendation that it pass; and I ask for its present consideration for the reason that the substitute reported is the same that was in a section of a bill that was considered by the Committee on Mines and Mining and passed. It has already been considered and passed by the Senate and is well guarded, and I should like to have the bill out on its passage now.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Senator from Nevada asks for the present consideration of the bill just reported by him. It requires unanimous consent to consider a bill on the day it is reported. No objection being made, it is before the Senate.

THE TARIFF BILL.

A message from the House of Representatives, by Mr. McPHERSON, its Clerk, announced that the House had passed a bill (H. R. No. 718) to provide increased revenue from imports, and for other purposes, in which it requested the concurrence of the Senate.

Mr. FESSENDEN. I hope the Senator from Nevada will allow me to take up the tariff bill, which has just been brought in, for the purpose of having it referred and printed.

Mr. STEWART. This will take but a moment.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Senator from Maine asks unanimous consent to take up the tariff bill just received from the House of Representatives. The Chair hears no objection.

The bill (H. R. No. 718) to provide increased revenue from imports, and for other purposes, was read twice by its title.

Mr. FESSENDEN. I move that the bill be referred to the Committee on Finance. It will be printed, of course, under the rules.

Mr. GRIMES. I move to amend that motion by referring the bill with instructions to the committee to report it on the second Wednesday in December next.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The question is on the amendment of the Senator from Iowa to the motion to refer.

Mr. CONNESS. This will necessarily lead to discussion, and I hope the pending bill will be allowed to be disposed of first.

Mr. FESSENDEN. If the tariff bill is to be referred to the committee it is very important that it should be printed, and it is very important that it should be done immediately. It is very late in the session, and the question ought to be settled on the motion of the Senator from Iowa.

Mr. CONNESS. Very well, I will not interpose.

Mr. GRIMES. Mr. President—

Mr. POMEROY. I suggest that this matter be laid aside informally until we get through with the morning business.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Senator from Iowa is recognized by the Chair as having the floor.

Mr. GRIMES. I do not know, Mr. President, that it will be in order for me to discuss the general merits of this proposition on such a motion as this; and I have no disposition to do so, even if it were in order, but I wish to submit one or two observations in connection with the motion that I have made.

We are now in the eighth month of a very long and arduous session of Congress. The members of this body have been laboriously engaged, more laboriously than ordinarily, during that long period of time. This tariff bill, which affects the prosperity of the country and the personal and business interests of every man in it, reaches us at this late period, and I undertake to say that the members of this body are not prepared to enter upon the consideration and discussion of such a subject as this is, affecting the vital interests that it does, at this time. I think that a bill making such radical changes as this bill proposes to make should be laid a sufficient length of time before the people of the country in order that there may be some response from them as to what their judgment is of the merits of the proposition.

Another reason why I think it should be postponed is that we should give an opportunity for our finance committees and the Treasury Department, the men who have the charge of our finances, and the people of the country themselves, to see what may be the effect of the internal revenue law which we have recently passed. I am convinced, for myself, that that law will afford sufficient relief to all the industrial interests that are sought to be protected by the provisions of the bill now on your table. I understand from a gentleman who has made a most thorough investigation and in whose conclusions and whose judgment I place the most implicit reliance, that under the provisions of that law there will be a relief to the industrial interests of the State of Pennsylvania alone of from eighteen to twenty-five millions on the three articles of coal, iron, and steel.

Another reason why I desire that this bill should be postponed is that we may know whether or not it is to effect the advantages which some of its advocates claim that it will effect in some sections of the country. We were told, as I see by the newspapers—I did not happen to be present at the time—by the Senator from Massachusetts, [Mr. WILSON,] the other day, that this was a northwestern measure, and I think that there were two members of a coordinate branch of this Government who stated in another body that this was a northwestern measure. It may be, Mr. President, but we have not thus far been able to conceive it to be that kind of a measure, and we want an opportunity to satisfy our constituents, if it be to their advantage, that it is going to operate to their advantage. As an evidence that we do not so regard it, I would refer the Senator from Massachusetts to the vote in another body, to which, perhaps, I have no right specifically to allude, where he will find that although the New England States voted solid for it, it being a northwestern measure, yet of the fifty-two votes that were polled against it forty of them were from the Northwest. I am not going to deny that there may be individuals in the Northwest and there may be individual interests in the Northwest that may conceive that they will be advantaged by the passage of such a bill as this upon your table; but I do deny that there is any very considerable portion of that part of the Northwest which I represent that is in favor of any such proposition at this time. It may be possible that after due consideration and discussion of this measure they may conclude that it would be to their advantage to pass such a bill; but I think that it will be some time before we shall be able to bring the people of the Northwest up to the belief that it is to their advantage to increase the duty on salt, an essential to their existence and their prosperity, thirty-three per cent. I do not believe that you can convince the people of my State that it will be to their advantage to put a duty upon that necessary to the development of their State, lumber, without which they cannot fence up their farms and make them productive of a single cent, of three dollars a thousand. I do not believe that you can convince the people of my State that it will be to their advantage to increase the duty on iron variously from ten to fifty dollars a ton; or that it will be for their advantage to increase the duty on the low grades of cutlery, such as go into every farmer's house, six hundred per cent.

Mr. POMEROY. If the Senator will allow me, he knows that I agree with him, but I think it is entirely out of order to discuss the merits of the bill on the question of reference.

Mr. GRIMES. I am not discussing the merits of the bill. I understand that on a question of this kind I have a right to assign the reasons why I think the bill ought to be postponed.

Mr. POMEROY. But I was speaking of the merits of the bill. On the question of the postponement of the bill to next December, of course the reasons why it should or should not be postponed may be stated; but I do not think it is proper to discuss the whole merits of the bill.

Mr. GRIMES. Mr. President, I have no desire to discuss the merits of the bill, but I have assigned, as I think, three reasons which are substantial reasons in my view why this question should go over until December. The bill, according to its provisions, cannot go into effect until the 1st of August. I do not think that the Committee on Finance can give it that consideration and investigation that it deserves, and that they will be disposed to bestow upon it, and be able to report it back and have it acted upon by this body before the 1st of August. The postponement therefore until the 1st of December will only be for four months. In the mean time we can learn what the sentiment of the country is in regard to a measure of this kind, and we can determine whether or not, in view of the law which we have passed in regard to internal taxation, there is absolutely any necessity for the passage of any such bill as this.

Mr. WADE. Mr. President, I have been taken entirely by surprise by this motion. I do not think we have any right, because it is supposed we are overworked and have been in session a great while, therefore to neglect what we consider the best interests of the country. I do not believe any of us are so entirely overworked as that we ought to shrink from endeavoring to maintain the best interests of the country according to our knowledge and ability. No one can be more anxious than I am to get out of this place; I should like very much to go at large for awhile; but I will never consent to desert my post as long as I think there are material interests that require investigation and action and labor, if necessary, here. I think, therefore, that that part of the argument ought not to apply.

It is said that the merits of the bill are not before us for consideration, and they are not, because they are not open to our scrutiny at present; but we do know that there are some great outside reasons why this bill should not be postponed for a single moment. We know that under the present tariff bill foreign imports are pouring into the country to such an extent that our exports bear no proportion whatever to our imports; that the country is drained of all its gold and silver the moment they are dug from the earth; and with all the capabilities of the great West to produce grain and provisions of all kinds, we are told, and I believe it is true, that wheat is now imported from Europe into this country for the sustenance of our people. Something therefore is wrong about it.

I do not like to see this question dealt with as a sectional question, for, in my judgment, it is not. It has none of the characteristics of such a question; and if it has, in my judgment, the Northwest, to which I belong, is altogether more interested than any other portion of this country. What is the Northwest now endeavoring to do at a vast expense to your Treasury, and I am not averse to it? You are endeavoring somehow to hew out channels by which you can convey your gross materials to a market either in the eastern States or in Europe. I am told that corn has been burned for fire-wood, or sold for ten or twelve cents a bushel in some parts of the Northwest, and you are endeavoring to make a channel whereby you may transport that article thousands of miles to market and make something in that way. Sir, that has been tried long enough. It is utterly absurd. The Northwest will never prosper under such a state of things as that. Something is wrong. I know it is said that eastern manufacturers grow rich by manufacturing. I hope they do; and I hope, if it should be proved that they do, that we of the Northwest will have the sense and sagacity to make use of the same means to enrich ourselves that enrich the manufacturers of the East. It is all idle to tell me that men in the East may be overgrown in wealth acquired by reason of a tariff on manufactures, and that we of the West cannot avail ourselves of it. In my judgment we ought to do it; in my judgment we ought not to let all of our produce go to Europe and take the avails of their pauper labor, rather than to bring manufactures nearer to hand. To me the proposition looks as absurd as the old fashion was said to be of putting your wheat in one end of a bag and a stone in the other and going to mill. I hope we shall not leave the country in this condition for a single hour longer than is necessary for us to adjust this thing.

But the Senator says it is to try an experiment. Since 1816 we have been trying the experiment of protection and free trade by turns, and every man conversant with the history of the country during this long period will find that in every instance the prosperity of the country has been exactly commensurate with the degree of protection that you gave to your own manufactures and your own industry; for it is not manufactures alone that are benefited by a tariff. Every kind of labor that human ingenuity can devise is benefited by it. By a free-trade system the countries of Europe, with their overgrown wealth and their skill in manufacturing, and by means of their pauper and unpaid labor, are enabled to underbid us; and when they do that they bring their articles into competition with everything that we raise as well in the Northwest as anywhere else.

The Senator speaks of iron. Will the people of Iowa be benefited by putting a further duty on the article of iron, or will they be benefited by sending their wheat, and their corn, and their beef to Europe, and having their iron and cutlery manufactured there and paid for in these gross articles at this immense expenditure of transportation? What is the iron manufactured abroad composed of? How much of the provisions that you raise in Iowa for sale are comprised in a ton of iron, or in a given quantity of cutlery that you speak of? Do not the workmen, from the time they enter the mines, have to feed upon some provisions that they get somewhere, and so on until the ore comes to be manufactured into cutlery and everything else? Those provisions are not of your furnishing, they are furnished abroad; they enter into every manufactured article that comes here, and which comes into competition with the provisions of the Northwest as much as it does with the manufactures of the East. It prevents our people from availing themselves of the benefit of their own labor, except that half savage labor that barely produces the grossest of articles.

Sir, I am satisfied that the country can never prosper under it. As to the suggestion that we are not now informed on the subject, let me ask if we did not appoint commissioners to spend the whole of the last vacation in investigating this very subject, men who were supposed to be of the highest skill and the most competent for such an investigation. Have they not made a very elaborate report upon the whole subject? What was that done for? Why did we pay those commissioners if no heed was to be given to the result of their investigations when they reported it? Does anybody criticize their report? Does anybody say that those men did not come to just conclusions? If we took such pains to ascertain what should be done, through competent persons, it would seem that we ought to be somewhat prepared now to enter upon the subject. When shall we be better prepared than we are now? Of course we cannot investigate the different items in this bill now while it is a sealed book to us; but there is no reason why we should not proceed to consider it. It has undergone the most thorough investigation in the other branch of Congress where the proper committee bestowed more labor upon it than was ever bestowed by any committee upon any subject before. After the committee reported it to the House, that body perfected the bill with great deliberation and great industry, and have come to a conclusion satisfactory to themselves. Because it involves a little labor shall we fail to look into the bill, and thus defeat their work? Sir, out of respect to the other branch, out of respect to the earnest demands of the country, we ought to second the motion they have made, take up this bill, discuss it, and if the bill is so absurd as some seem to suppose, reject it and be rid of it; but if it is beneficial, we should shrink from no labor necessary to bring us to a result in which the country is so vitally interested. I hope it will not for any of these reasons be postponed.

Mr. FESSENDEN. Perhaps I ought to say a word or two on this subject; but I do not propose to discuss the merits of the bill at all. I have kept pace in some degree with the examination that has been made of it in the other House while it has been under discussion there, and I know enough of the bill in its present condition to be very well satisfied that if it is sent, as I propose, to the Committee on Finance, it will involve very considerable labor on the part of that committee, for the bill will need very careful revision; and as to some of the conclusions to which the other House arrived I do not hesitate to say that my mind is entirely unconvinced of their correctness. But, sir, although that is the case, I wish to add that so far as the Committee on Finance are concerned they are perfectly ready to enter upon the examination of the bill, if committed to them by the Senate, and to devote to it all the labor which may be necessary in order to put it in such a shape as may be satisfactory to them, and which will, I hope, be satisfactory to the Senate after the labors of the committee shall have been concluded.

I agree with the Senator from Ohio that if it is advisable or necessary for the interest of the country to pass a bill revising the tariff at the present session, it ought not to be postponed from any consideration of our own convenience. I am as anxious to get away from here as anybody; I know that if the session is continued I must bear a very reasonable proportion of the labor to be gone through with in order to close the business at the proper time; but nevertheless, as I said before, the committee is ready and I am ready to enter upon the examination of the bill and to give to it all the time and all the care that we may think necessary in order to bring it properly before the Senate. It is very evident that it is a bill which will excite considerable discussion in whatever shape it may be put; and I will add that there are some provisions in the bill that I think absolutely essential, that ought to be passed at the present session in some shape. For instance, there is a section extending the time for the collection of the direct tax in the southern States, which I think is a measure of relief absolutely essential to them and which ought to be attended to at this session.

Mr. JOHNSON. That can be taken up separately.

Mr. FESSENDEN. Yes, it might be put in a separate bill. There are other business sections that also require immediate attention, and there are some matters now in the hands of the Committee on Finance which I had designed and hoped to put on this bill as amendments, which I also thought to be necessary.

With regard to my own individual opinions upon the general subject, I believe they are perfectly understood, and it is not necessary that I should say anything about them. I am, within all the limits allowed by the Constitution, what is called a protective tariff man. I have always been so since my entrance into public life, and I shall probably adhere to my opinions on that subject. As to the vote that has been given in the House of Representatives, I have nothing to say about it. I agree with my friend from Massachusetts who stated his views the other day, in one particular, and that is that this can by no means be considered a bill got up in the interest of New England, although I notice that some of the western papers take great pains to suggest that idea. Notwithstanding that, the vote of New England was pretty much solid for the bill; and I mention it not as proving in my judgment that it was peculiarly applicable to New England interests, but as proving the loyalty of New England and their disinterestedness—their loyalty to their belief, and to the system which they have always advocated. If they need these things now less than other sections of the country, it does not follow that it is part of the character of New England to shrink from what they deem necessary to be done for the good of the whole country. The gentlemen of the other House from different sections of the country are, however, responsible for their own votes, and they must consider what it is best for them to do. The result, what they have done, is before us. They have sent this bill to us; and yet it is for us now to consider whether we shall proceed to complete the work which they have begun, revise it if necessary, and make the necessary changes, or whether we shall direct, so far as we are concerned, that the matter shall not be considered at the present session.

On that point I do not intend to offer any remarks whatever. It is not for me to settle. All that I have to do is to express my own readiness to enter upon the work if such is the desire of the Senate, and to express my wish that it should be entered upon, believing that a revision of the tariff is necessary; but every member of the Senate is as well able to judge of that necessity as I am. If that necessity has been brought about, I think it has been brought about by action for which I am not responsible, and more by the action of members of both Houses from other sections of the country than my own, in their opposition to what I conceived to be a very necessary reduction of the currency, which, in reality, is creating, in my judgment, a great part of the difficulty that we are now laboring under. Whether this is necessary in order to meet the difficulties thus occasioned, and whether we should act immediately on the subject, Senators will consider. It has been before them a long time. This bill was under debate in the other House for several weeks. Senators all know the result. They have all been thinking of it. They know their own position. I shall not undertake at present, in this stage of the bill, on a motion to refer it to the Committee on Finance, of which I happen to be chairman, to discuss the general question. I presume, from what has been passing in this Chamber for the last three or four days, the mind of every Senator is made up on the point whether we are to enter upon the examination of the subject at the present session or not. Whatever the Senate does I shall endeavor to be satisfied with, and if any other duty is imposed upon me or the committee of which I am a member at the present session, I can only repeat that we are perfectly ready to enter upon it and discharge it to the best of our ability.

Mr. HENDERSON. I do not wish to take up the time of the Senate; but I am very much in hopes that the Senate will consent to postpone to a future day the consideration of this bill. Of course it would be improper, even if I were informed of the different provisions of the bill that the House has sent to us, to enter into a discussion of the merits of it at this time. I am not and cannot be sufficiently acquainted with it to speak of its details until it shall have been printed and laid before us; but, sir, I understand the general character of the bill is to increase the duties upon imports. I believe it decreases the duty upon scarcely any article whatever.

Mr. GRIMES. It does on Surat cotton.

Mr. HENDERSON. Then that is an additional reason why it ought to be postponed. By our recent internal revenue act the internal taxation is increased but upon one article, and that is the article of cotton.

In 1862, the first excise act was passed by Congress, and its passage was made the excuse immediately for a bill increasing the duties on imported articles. Of course, it was said, if we levied a tax upon the manufacturer in this country, it became absolutely necessary to protect the manufacturer against the tax that he had to pay to the Government, and we raised the tariff in that year, and the next year, 1863, it was again materially increased. The internal taxes have been increased every year since that time until the present year; and every session, immediately upon an increase of internal taxes, we have thought it necessary, and perhaps it was necessary, to increase the tariff. I made no resistance to that increase of the tariff from year to year. I cannot say, however, that I am, as the Senator from Maine avows himself to be, a protective tariff man. I have never been, and I am not yet convinced of the necessity for it; and the legislation of the last four years satisfies me more than anything that has ever occurred in this country of the utter futility of what is called a high protective tariff to prevent excessive importations into this country.

In 1863 I remember that upon a kindred subject, the banking question, I said to the Senate that importations would always exceed exportations as long as we had an inflated currency. Pass this prohibitive bill which has been sent here by the other House, because I regard it as a prohibitive bill—it would be prohibitive under a currency of four or five hundred millions—but pass it with your nine hundred and seventeen millions of currency that you now have, and I have but little question that importations will largely exceed exportations. This is not the point for Congress to commence at in order to reform the excessive importations into our country. We have to reduce our inflated currency; and until we make the paper currency of our country equal to coin and keep it there, we shall never prevent importations in excess of exportations. Whenever an importer can buy his goods with gold at 25, and sell them with gold at 52 he will import, I care not what your tariff may be. His patriotism may be very extensive; it may be very large; but if he can make money—and he can always make money to the extent of the increase in the price of gold from the time he imports to the time he sells—his patriotism will never be large enough to conquer his interest, because he thinks the country can yet prosper and he can grow rich. Until you prevent fluctuations in the paper currency we shall never get rid of the difficulty referred to by the Senator from Ohio. He says we should increase the tariff because our importations are excessive. Mr. President, you may pass this bill, and if you will just add one hundred millions to your currency, as is asked for by the Comptroller of the Currency, I will guaranty that your importations will be larger next year than they were last year.

Mr. WADE. Will the Senator tell me how he is about to reform this inflated currency while all your specie goes out of the country to pay for foreign goods? He says the first thing necessary is to regulate the currency. I should like to know how that can be done.

Mr. HENDERSON. Really that would open up a discussion that would be very burdensome upon me. The Senator has heard my views upon currency questions, if he paid any attention to them, on several occasions when I have addressed the Senate. I cannot now enter upon that subject. It is certainly too vast a field for me to enter upon. I may say, however, that there are various ways in which there might be a curtailment of the currency. If I had my way, I could tell the Senator very plainly how I would begin it; but of course he would differ with me so essentially in that regard that my argument would amount to nothing in his estimation.

But, Mr. President, I was saying that since 1862 we have been annually increasing the tariff, and what has been the excuse for it every year? We all know that it was because we were levying internal duties, and it was said that a corresponding increase of the tariff was absolutely essential to save our manufacturers from oppression and ruin; but what have we done at this session? This year we have decreased the excise tax on all manufactured articles from six per cent. to five per cent. We have taken a large number of manufactured articles previously taxed and put them on the free list. Now, will any gentleman tell me, under such circumstances, what excuse there is for a still higher tariff than we had before? If I understand it, there is an increase of the duties upon railroad iron in this bill to the extent of about eight dollars per ton.

Mr. WADE. None at all.

Mr. HENDERSON. Then it has been very recently altered.

Mr. FESSENDEN. Yes; it was altered in the other House.

Mr. HENDERSON. It must have been altered just before the bill was passed. I understand, at any rate, that on almost all articles of iron manufacture there is a very large increase of duty; for instance, on cutlery an increase of from seventy-five to two hundred per cent.

Mr. JOHNSON. Three hundred and forty-five per cent. in several cases.

Mr. HENDERSON. Will you tell me the reason for that? Have we not taken the internal taxes off iron in almost every instance? We have certainly decreased the excise tax on the manufacturers of iron in almost every case, and yet we have a tariff bill increasing largely the duty upon iron and all its manufactures.

Our New England friends, some years ago, found much joy in a high tariff, because it always tended to protect manufactures, and manufactures were almost exclusively confined to that land of ingenuity and enterprise, for which I have always given them credit. I, like the Senator from Ohio, desire exceedingly that my own State shall become a manufacturing State. I should be glad to make it as much so as the State of Ohio. But, sir, the manufactures of Ohio do not need the encouragement that the Senator is asking for in this bill. He has referred to the corn that we are burning for fuel in our section of country. Why is it that we have no sale for it? Can we export articles to other countries and expect other countries to pay for them unless we buy something from those countries? We are not yet exactly prepared to begin manufacturing to such an extent in the West. We want a market for our wheat; we want a market for our corn; we want a market for the thousands of agricultural productions that we have in the West for which we can get no market in this country. Will the Senator from Ohio impose a high tariff duty on corn in order to protect the western farmer? What good would it do? If you levy duties sufficient to enable the constituents of my friend from Iowa and my constituents to enter upon manufacturing what will be the result? It will be a bonus to the manufacturers of the State of Ohio, at least until we can get under headway in our section, and it takes a long time.

I have no aversion to protection. I am very glad to give it where I can do it with justice to every section of the country. I am not opposed to building up the manufactures of this country. On the other hand, I am in favor of doing it; and inasmuch as during this session of Congress we have decreased the internal taxes so largely and made a great many articles free that we formerly taxed, I ask, in the name of sense, why is it necessary just now to increase the tariff? The excuse in former years, ever since 1862, has been that we were increasing the excise tax, and therefore must increase the tariff. Now that excuse is gone, and the only argument left is the cogent one presented by my friend from Ohio.

Mr. President, as I before stated, that is not the point to begin at. Unless we can make it so as to have exchanges regular between Europe and this country we shall never get rid of these excessive importations; they will continue on our hands, and raising the tariff with a view to decrease importations and save the gold in this country will amount to nothing. Forty millions of gold have gone from our country within a few months past, perhaps fifty millions since the 1st of January, and not less than thirty-five millions within the last six or seven weeks since the panic in Europe in commercial and financial matters. Why is that? There is a double reason for it. One reason is that they have hurried goods upon us; they wanted to get rid of goods in Europe, and they have forced them upon the market at as low rates as they could possibly afford to sell them. The desire there was to get rid of property because a war was threatened, and they forced goods upon us. Another reason is that our bonds have been driven back upon us and coin called for to go abroad. But another thing, and the chief point, is what I have already suggested, that the war in Europe necessarily increased the price of gold in this country, and that in itself induced individuals to import, because men who at the beginning of these troubles bought gold in the gold-room at New York, feeling certain that gold would rise in consequence of European troubles, also felt certain that goods would rise in this country in consequence of the increased price of gold. What has been the result? Some time ago a merchant could buy exchange when gold was at twenty-five per cent. premium, for about ten per cent. added to that, making 135 for exchange on London. How is it now? That same exchange is worth 160. Of course, therefore, a merchant can sell goods which he bought at 135 for 160, besides the usual percentage that he adds upon his transactions. That, of course, tends to enrich him, but what is the result upon the general interests of the country? Just in proportion as the importer is enriched, just in that proportion does the country at large lose, and just in that proportion is financial difficulty brought upon the whole country.

We do not get rid of these difficulties by increasing the tariff; and I now prophesy, as I did in 1863 when a proposition was made here to increase the tariff, that if you increase the present tariff your importations next year, unless we can in some way curtail our excessive and redundant circulation, will in all probability exceed what they were last year. When the present tariff was proposed what did our financial men tell us? They said it would produce a revenue of seventy or eighty millions. It has produced to the Government $170,000,000.

Mr. WADE. Will the Senator allow me to ask him a question right here?

Mr. HENDERSON. Certainly.

Mr. WADE. If an increase of the tariff will increase our revenue so much and not stop the importation of foreign goods, ought we not certainly to make use of it as a revenue measure? Some pretend to say that the importations will fall off. The Senator says they will not.

Mr. HENDERSON. I think not.

Mr. WADE. If they will not fall off, is it not the most obvious thing in the world that we ought to put on a higher tariff?

Mr. HENDERSON. They may fall off or they may increase; it is owing entirely to the condition of the country. If gold continues to go down, of course they will decrease; if gold goes up, they will increase; and if panics in this country produce revulsions in the money market, of course importations will be large. That is my construction; and I cannot be mistaken, because the past history of the country demonstrates it beyond doubt; and I have shown the reasons for it. The interest of the merchants is, of course, in that direction.

As this bill is a general increase of the tariff, I see no necessity for it. The Senator says we want it as a revenue measure. He is mistaken. Why is it that we have decreased the excise tax? It is because we collected last year more money than we needed. Was not that it? If we need the vast amount of money that the Senator imagines, why is it that we have decreased so largely the internal tax? I imagine that we have thrown off at least fifty millions by the change recently made in the internal revenue law. Is it the policy of Congress to throw off fifty millions from the internal revenue and to collect fifty or one hundred millions of increased duties upon the tariff? What sort of a policy is that? Is that justice?

Mr. President, our New England friends have found out that the tariff system begins to operate in two ways. They find that our friends in the central States have now power sufficient to make them pay something in the shape of tariff duties. For instance, a few years ago they were in the habit of getting their coal from Nova Scotia and other British Provinces, and they received it free of duty. Now Pennsylvania and Maryland step in and say, "While you are taxing everything, suppose you put a tariff duty upon coal which you have been using in your manufactures in New England," and they have had to yield. They fought against it, but I understand that that duty is left in this bill. Hence it is that New England says she has not much interest in it now, after having enjoyed the benefits during the last four or five years of increasing duties all the time. I say that without any aspersion upon New England, because these high tariffs have been a necessity heretofore, and I applaud the loyalty, the intelligence, and the shrewdness of our New England friends. I do not blame them for supporting tariffs; but now our friends in the central States find themselves strong enough to make New England begin to pay; and hence New England folds her arms and says, "We have no especial interest in this tariff." Why, sir, New England has a very great interest in it, because it is a large manufacturing country; but they are injured by this bill in a great many of their interests, and I suppose in this one of coal; but in many other respects they are greatly benefited by the bill. I am not, therefore, surprised that, however much New England grumbled and complained in the lower House against many of the provisions of this measure, yet when it came to the final vote, as has been stated, the New England men voted for it simply because, taking it all together, it was beneficial to that section. I do not blame my friend from Ohio for arguing in favor of the passage of this measure, because Ohio is now one of the largest of our manufacturing States.

But, sir, if we are going to pass a tariff bill, it is a measure of great importance, and it needs more consideration than we can possibly give it now. I do not think, taking it altogether, that much has been made by our friends in the wool interest. Some of the western men supposed they were going to gain much in this tariff by a duty on wool; but when they come to look at the final result, they will find that they have scarcely increased the tariff on wool at all, and yet have increased it from thirty to fifty per cent. upon woolen manufactures; and I think in view of that result they will be disposed to draw back. It turns out that the duty on the raw material, wool, is not increased very largely, but by the peculiar phraseology of the bill, if I do not misunderstand it, it is a tariff upon woolen manufactures instead of upon wool. Hence it is that we have gone shearing, and have not got anything. That is my idea about it, and if my friend from Ohio insists upon this plan being carried out, and it is done, he will find in the course of a few years that coin will be sent from the country entirely, bankruptcy will succeed, the paper of your national banks will fall to the ground, and we shall find ourselves not only individually bankrupt but the nation in bankruptcy. That is my idea; I cannot help so thinking; and we shall find that agricultural productions which are burned as fuel now will be continued to be burned as fuel in the West.

To mature a tariff bill requires more time than we have now. There is no necessity for it now. We have decreased the internal taxes already, and we now have a very high protective tariff, and the idea of increasing it for the purpose of preventing importations is all moonshine. The idea that I must give one half of my fortune to my neighbor in order to save the public finances and to save the public credit, is all moonshine. Gentlemen may make a learned argument, and a very plausible one, to induce me to believe it; but I will not believe it. Tell it to the Jews; tell it not to me.

I know it has been said, year after year, for the last five years; that we should check excessive importations; but just as you increase the tariff so you increase the paper currency of the country and increase prices, and one merely urges on the other; one is an aggravation of the other, and it will continue so until after awhile everything is done upon a false credit in the community.

Mr. President, I perceive from the remarks of the able chairman of the Finance Committee that he is not disposed to examine this bill at this session. The weather is warm. We cannot be expected to remain here much longer; we ought not to be required to do so. The necessary legislation, that which is absolutely essential, ought to be passed upon at once, and then we ought to be permitted to leave this capital. The people of the country ought not to require at our hands that we should stay here during this warm weather. This bill is a measure of vast importance, one affecting the financial, one affecting the commercial, one affecting the agricultural and manufacturing interests of the country to such an extent that we ought to give it more time and more consideration than we can possibly devote to it at this session. I think, therefore, the Senator from Iowa has made a motion for which the country is indebted to him. It is exactly the motion that ought to have been made. We ought to get rid of the examination of this measure at the present session, because it is one not pressed upon us by any important interest of the country; it is not needed by any of the great interests of the country; but so far from it, it is a measure which strikes, in my judgment, at the best interests of the country both North and South, because while it may benefit a few individuals it strikes at the national heart, and ultimately, in my honest judgment, will subvert all the great and best interests of the land. Therefore it ought to be postponed, and at the next session we should begin at an early day and revise the tariff duties in such a way as to do justice to North and South, East and West.

Mr. WILSON. I shall vote, Mr. President, to commit this bill to the Committee on Finance with instructions to report early in December. I shall so vote because I believe the permanent interests of the whole country demand that the adjustment of the tariff should be made after the most thorough examination, research, and care. Congress cannot take too much time nor devote too much attention to the proper adjustment of a measure that so deeply concerns the revenues of the Government and the varied productive interests of the country. This great work should be carefully performed, and it must be carefully performed, if it is to continue, as it ought to continue, for some years. Nothing can be more fatal to the industries of the country than the frequent changes in the revenue laws that have marked the last half dozen years.

We have revised the internal revenue system of the country after the most elaborate examination, and the adjustment of the duties on foreign imports demands and should receive the same intelligent care. The internal revenue bill just passed will remove the burdens imposed in time of war upon the productive interests of the country. I think it can do no harm if we shall wait four months to see how this great measure shall affect the business interests of the people. If we wait until December, if we bestow the same care upon the revision of the tariff that we have bestowed upon the internal revenue system, we shall not be forced to change it within the next year or two.

I know, sir, that there are some interests that will be promoted by the immediate passage of this bill that comes to us from the House of Representatives. There are other and great interests that will not be promoted by its enactment. I have received many letters from business men of intelligence and character showing how certain provisions of this bill will injuriously affect some of the leading interests of the country. There are mistakes and errors in this measure—mistakes and errors that can only be corrected by devoting more time than we can now command to its examination. Surely the interests of the country will not materially suffer by the delay of a few months.

The Senator from Missouri tells us that the wool-growing interest has made but a poor arrangement—that they went wool-gathering and got fleeced. I think the Senator is altogether mistaken. At any rate the wool-growing interest has made an arrangement that will annually impose upon the manufacturers of the country an average of at least $40,000,000 for the next five years. The passage of this measure will stimulate the raising of wool, especially in the West, and the increased supply will after four or five years unquestionably reduce the prices of the article. On a large portion of the articles manufactured from the wool protected by this bill, the manufacturers gain nothing by this arrangement. There are, however, some woolen manufactures that would gain by the passage of this measure.

Mr. HENDERSON. There is a large increase upon every woolen manufacture.

Mr. WILSON. There is an increased duty on all articles manufactured from wool; but the increase on some of them is less than the increase on the wools out of which they are manufactured. There is one interest that has sprung up during the past few years that will be largely benefited by the passage of this bill; I mean the worsted interest. Eight or ten million dollars have been invested in the manufacture of worsteds, making an annual product of eighteen or twenty millions. The wools are imported from Canada, and under the reciprocity treaty came in duty free. These wools now pay a duty, and the worsted interest is suffering greatly by the duty imposed upon the Canadian wools. This interest ought to be relieved, and I wish we could secure such legislation as would afford immediate relief.

I said the other day, Mr. President, in reply to the remarks of the Senator from Indiana, that this tariff had a western origin. I again repeat that this tariff originated, not in New England, but in the Northwest. It came from the wool-growers west of the Alleghenies, who have a deeper interest in its passage than the people of any other section of the country. I do not oppose the passage of the bill now because it had a western rather than an eastern origin. What I objected to the other day and what I object to now is that New England should be singled out and charged with the sin of the paternity of this measure. While the representatives of Massachusetts, and of New England have voted on general principles for this bill, they have so voted with a great deal of hesitation, doubt, and reluctance. They saw what was clear to the comprehension of gentlemen of ordinary intelligence, that this measure imposed increased duties upon raw material, increased largely the cost of production, and subjected the manufacturing and mechanical interests of their section to the censure and hostility of those who spare no occasion to manifest their hostility to that section of our country.

I am not among those who believe that the lasting interests of the country will suffer by allowing this proposed revision of the tariff to be carefully examined by commissioning the Finance Committee, in whom we have confidence, and in whom the country has great confidence, to bestow upon this measure the time required to make as perfect a measure as the wit of man can devise. Believing that it will be for the lasting interests of all sections of the country that this new tariff bill shall be wisely framed, I shall vote for the motion made by the Senator from Iowa, to instruct the Finance Committee to report the bill at the beginning of the next session of Congress. I hope then to see reported a tariff for revenue, with incidental protection, in which the conflicting and varied industries of the people will be so adjusted and harmonized that it will receive the vote of Congress and the approval of the public judgment, and remain for years an evidence of the intelligence and integrity of the two Houses of Congress.

Mr. SPRAGUE. I do not desire to occupy the attention of the Senate more than a moment upon this question. I simply wish to express the hope that the Senate will refer the bill, without instructions, to the Committee on Finance, and that they will report a bill in accordance with the usual manner pursued by that committee. It will be recollected, in reference to the tax bill, that that committee entertained the subject at a very late period of the session, occupied but a very few days in its consideration, and presented it to the Senate in a comparatively perfect manner. It was promised by all those who took an interest in the subject of taxation that after the disposal of that bill the tariff would be adjusted in accordance with the revision of the tax bill. This bill is but a continuation of the tax bill; it is a part and parcel of it; and without it the other one is of no value and no consequence to the country, to its interests, to its industry, or to anything that at present occupies the attention of the people.

Now, sir, in regard to the point that has been made here that there has been no time devoted to the consideration of this subject, I will say that the committee in the other House devoted seven long months to its consideration. They have sent a measure here as perfect as, in the nature of things, it could be sent. There are some points in it in regard to which men from New England may differ as to its particular advantage to that section. Everybody may well concede that; but, sir, that the interest of this whole country is not very much benefited by this tariff, I deny; and I deny, also, that the manufacturing and other industrial interests of this country are not very much in need of an adjustment of the tariff. Why, sir, the whole woolen industry of this country is prostrate. It cannot live, it will not live, if the present state of things continues. No new enterprises will be entered into; and if you strike a blow at it now the old ones will hesitate, will pause, and cease to operate.

You have throughout the whole session been devoting your attention to see how you would dispose of the public money. There has been hardly a day that I have occupied a seat here but what there have been propositions before us to appropriate the public money for some object or another. To-day when a measure is introduced to enable us to raise the money to be devoted to those appropriations, what do you say? You have not time to devote yourselves to the great industries of this country. I have heard no reason adduced by any Senator who has opposed the present consideration of this measure that seems to me worthy of attention, or sufficient to make any Senator, favorable to a tariff and to the protection of American industry, hesitate as to the vote he shall give. New England may complain at lumber being taxed, at coal being taxed, and because there is a duty on salt; but, sir, those in my judgment are very immaterial elements in connection with this bill. The tax on the coal that is introduced into this country from Nova Scotia really amounts to nothing, for the reason that it has been discovered by all those who have used the two articles of coal that the southern coal, the Maryland and Virginia coal, is superior to the coal received from Nova Scotia, and sufficiently so to counterbalance the difference in duties.

There are in this country two great interests that have recently gained some strength and some foundation. One is the woolen interest, but a youthful growth. It has been within the last twelve years that it has gained any foundation or any strength. The linen interest is another. The attention of the people of the country and of the legislation of the country has been directed to them, and at this session the Senate legislated specially for one of those interests.

Mr. President, to my mind every consideration connected with the industry of the country, the finances of the country, and the prosperity of the people, demands that this bill should be taken up at the present time, should be legislated upon, and given to the country as the law of the land.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The motion before the Senate is that the bill from the House of Representatives be referred to the Committee on Finance. As an amendment to that motion the Senator from Iowa moves that the committee be instructed to postpone their report until the second Wednesday in December next; and the question is on the amendment to the motion.

Mr. EDMUNDS. I demand the yeas and nays on that amendment to the motion.

The yeas and nays were ordered.

Mr. WADE. There is only one thing I wish to add to what has been said as a reason why this measure should not be postponed. It is a view that has hardly been touched, I believe, in the course of the argument, and it is one that occurs to me as being of very great weight. Of course I am not prepared to take the bill up, if it was in order to do so, and to argue it in detail; but I feel the exceeding importance of the measure before us in one view that is now perfectly in order; and that is, the business of the country is languishing and embarrassed all the time because we do not fix upon something in relation to the tariff. We have been here for nearly eight months, and we have kept business men in perfect uncertainty as to what we would do about it. They stand in peril and in jeopardy every hour, because they do not know what course we are to take upon this subject; and now you propose to keep them in this kind of suspense for five or six or eight months longer, perhaps to the very end of the next session; and then the argument would be just as applicable as it is now.

Gentlemen tell us about the great deliberation that should be given to this subject. There is not a Senator who does not know that from the hour this Senate adjourns not a gentleman here will turn his attention to this subject for a single moment until we meet again, and if the agitation of it has brought it under his consideration now, he will during the vacation forget what he knows upon the subject at present. It is all idle to talk about that. I know the Senator from Massachusetts says he is going to have it so entirely perfect that it will stand forever. The House of Representatives have been nearly eight months in coming to a conclusion satisfactory to themselves, with all the light that the commissioners who had the subject under consideration could throw upon it; and yet gentlemen rise here and say they are not prepared to vote upon it, but they have seen enough of it to know that it is full of all kinds of the most egregious errors and absurdities. That is not very complimentary to those who have had it under consideration so long and who have come to conclusions satisfactory to themselves. I do not know but that gentlemen can see great errors in it; I do not know but that the subject is one about which mathematical certainty can be brought to bear; but I never heard that it could, and I never believed that it could. No one man can comprehend it all, or begin to comprehend it all; but when the best minds of the country, those having the greatest experience and knowledge on this subject, have deliberated upon it for eight long months, with every facility that this Legislature could place in their hands to come to a right conclusion, I am not prepared to say that all their work is most absurd and ought to be revised from beginning to end. I do not believe it; and I believe we are as ready now, to-day, to enter upon the consideration of the bill as we ever shall be, and I know that the interests of the country are languishing on account of this delay. Sir, you had better stand by your present tariff to-day than to postpone this measure and keep the business of the country in this jeopardy of suspense all the time. It is better that you should say you will not revise your present tariff, full of errors as it is, than that you should postpone this bill. If you postpone it, the question with business men will be, as it has been for a year past, "What will Congress do when they come together? How can we invest our money, and how can we engage in business?" "What will Congress do about the tariff?" will be a question that will be attended with the constant stagnation of business.

I am astonished that western men object to this tariff bill. I know that the wool-growing interest of the Northwest is an immense interest. I do not believe there is a gentleman here from that region but what has been overwhelmed with letters on the subject, endeavoring to get a tariff on wool, from the Northwest everywhere. If there is such a one his experience has been very different from what mine has been. I believe that while this tariff is not all they would wish for on that subject, it is of great importance to them, and they are ready and anxious that it should be acted upon. Talk to me about localities! They have nothing to do with it. If New England, under the protecting influence of former tariffs and the ingenuity of her people, has been enabled to overcome all the difficulties that are incumbent upon a people just entering upon these manufacturing establishments, as they have been overcome, so that in many branches of business they can compete with the world, and do not care about your protection, that is no reason why we in the Northwest, who are in the same condition that they formerly were when they wanted protection, should throw it off and throw everything in their hands. In my judgment, it is the same species of absurdity for the great Northwest to go to New England for everything of a manufactured kind that she wants as it is for her to go to Old England. All the difference is in distance; in principle it is the same. That great Northwest, which is destined yet to be the glory of this great nation, will never attain the condition she ought to have in this Republic until by protection she does build up manufactures and can vie with the world in that respect. There is no other way to do it except by protecting our infant establishments against the great monopolies that can overwhelm us, and without protection it is their interest to overwhelm us in New England, and in England and other European countries. There is nothing but labor that makes a people great or rich or influential. If you do not encourage labor; if you do not bring every hand to work at profitable labor, you never will build up your institutions to that degree of prosperity which they ought to attain; and you never can do it except by protection. I say to-day, even before we have established our institutions at the West, a tariff would be infinitely to our advantage.

Does any gentleman here wish to bring the American mechanic and laborer in his daily wages down to the miserable starvation pauper prices of Europe? Does selfishness dictate that you shall adopt a policy that will compel you to do that? Sir, my sympathies are with the laborer, and I never will make the American mechanic compete with the pauper of Europe. I will pay him more. His work then will be more profitable; it will be infinitely more enlightened; and very soon you will find that the paid, intelligent labor of the American citizen, built up under the protecting influence of the Government, will be infinitely superior, even to the employer, than the pauper labor is. Who here is the advocate of trampling down the American mechanic and the American laborer? I am for building them up. I am for protecting the American laborer everywhere against the pauper rivalry of Europe, or New England, if you please; and I hope that this great subject will not be postponed for a moment.

What was the argument of the Senator from Missouri? He says if we put a tariff on higher than what we have had, it will increase importations, and we shall be overwhelmed with foreign goods. That is a way of considering the subject that I never had thought of; but if there is any truth in it, it shows the greater necessity immediately of raising your tariff. Our poverty in this country, and our inflated currency, arise from the fact that your gold mines are absorbed at once by Europe. Your gold does not stay here an hour; it goes right off to Europe to pay for what? The clothes you wear upon your backs and wherewith you clothe your families, and for the products of their manufactories, coming in direct competition with the raw material here, because the raw material raised in other countries is worked up and brought in here in competition with our own.

Sir, I am the advocate of the wool-grower's interest, and every other interest in the Northwest; and, in my judgment, western gentlemen stand in their own light when they throw open the trade of the world to the monopolies of England or even New England. I feel that New England is comparatively indifferent on this subject. She will vote for the measure. She will vote for it on patriotic principles, if none other, because I am not the man to disparage New England. But, sir, as I said before, her establishments, which when in their infancy were built up by the protection of the Government, have now become strong enough to stand on their own feet, and in all the coarser fabrics perhaps can compete with the world, and are not very solicitous for a tariff for protection. It is true, on many of the finer and more costly fabrics they need protection now; but they can do very well with the coarser kind; and in that way they are indifferent, as I said before. But we of the Northwest are vitally interested in it, for our vast products of wheat, corn, beef, flour, &c., cannot profitably find a foreign market; they are too bulky; the transportation is too expensive; their whole value is absorbed by the conveyance. The way to prevent that is to encourage manufacturing establishments to grow up among us, where they can take the advantage of our cheap food, and have the manufacturer along-side of the consumer. I should think every man would be for it; but the Northwest I know and feel are interested in it; and I am a northwestern man.

The Senator says that Ohio is a great manufacturing State. Sir, that is not so. What few manufactories we have are in their infancy, and free trade would annihilate them at a blow.

He says we have increased the tariff during the war. So we did; and your war would have been a failure and your bonds would have been no better than confederate bonds to-day if you had had no tariff. Your paper would have been multiplied endlessly, and would have been worth nothing. It was your tariff that upheld it. It is your tariff that by encouraging American labor must keep your specie from going out of the country. There is no other way to do it. The gentleman talks of increasing the specie basis. How are you going to do it? He could not tell us how he would do it. He says that fifty millions of specie, in less than six months, have gone out of the country. I say that all your specie, if you get one hundred millions from all the mines of your country, will go out to pay foreign productions that could be made much better at home as fast as you can dig it out of the mines. We must have a better policy. This unreasonable method must give way to a more enlightened policy.

Why does Great Britain send her emissaries here preaching free trade all the time, subsidizing presses to advocate it, hiring traveling agents to preach it, expending millions to pervert our minds on that subject? Why, sir, her people were the most highly protected on the face of the earth, until by encouraging her own labor and building up her own manufactures she had acquired the monopoly of manufactures throughout the world by the very process of protection; and when she stood so high, with her machinery all perfect, her wealth infinite and ready to annihilate any infant establishments, then, for the same reasons that she had secured the exclusive manufactures of the world by protection, she preaches now free trade, that she may keep that monopoly and prevent other nations from growing up and manufacturing to vie with her. That is all there is of that. Besides, sir, most of her croaking about free trade is perfect hypocrisy; for if you look at her tariff to-day it is more protective than ours. She raises a greater revenue to-day from the importation of foreign goods than we do; yet she is croaking about protection all the time. Every article that she can manufacture; every article that will build up her interests she protects; and where she has such a monopoly that she can overwhelm other establishments in other countries, there she preaches free trade. Sir, I hope we shall not be gulled by this song of free trade from across the ocean. "Take no counsel of your enemies" is the first lesson of war. She teaches that to us, and it ought to be a beacon to warn us off the coast. She never teaches anything for our advantage knowingly; for a more selfish nation never existed on the face of God's earth, nor a more tyrannical one, nor one that grinds down the face of the poor with such remorseless energy as does Great Britain.

Now, sir, I can see no reason on earth why the Senate of the United States, with so elaborate a system, almost perfected, except that we are to pass our judgments upon the work before us, should postpone its consideration. It has been got into shape, and does not require the labor they had to go through with in the House in order to understand it. It is organized; the evidence is all at hand; it is ready; the brief is made up, and the judge can take his notes and go through with it in one tenth of the time and with one tenth part of the labor that was bestowed upon it in the House, and come to an enlightened conclusion. In view of this fact, and while the great interests of the country are watching for us to fix something that they may rely upon, for Heaven's sake let us not disappoint them by our indolence, our childish impatience to leave these Halls and go home. Let us not sacrifice the great interests of the country. Let us stay here until we have perfected our work, if it takes us the year round. That is why we took upon ourselves the burdens of this position, and we have no right to relinquish it while anything profitable to the country is to be done. That is all I wish to say about it.

Mr. GRIMES. Mr. President, I am really curious to know where the Senator from Ohio has discovered that trade and business are in such a languishing condition as he has represented, and what particular branches of industry are in such a bad condition. So far as I have heard or been able to investigate the subject, my opinion is exactly the reverse of that of the Senator from Ohio. I suppose that the best evidence upon this subject is to be found in your internal revenue returns. They show that during the last month the receipts were upward of twelve million dollars; and I see published in the newspapers that in one day during the present month we have received upward of two million dollars. Does that show that business is languishing anywhere? Are not the mills all running to their full capacity? Are not the iron manufactories in Pennsylvania, and elsewhere, rolling out all the iron they can possibly roll out? Does the Senator suppose that they roll it out to a disadvantage or a loss to themselves? And if they have not made such immense profits during the past year, how much, let me ask the Senator from Ohio, have we relieved them by the passage of the internal revenue law? We have removed the entire excise upon railroad iron; we have removed all the excise upon bloom and pig metal; we have removed a portion of the excise on all other manufactures of iron; we have removed all excise upon the coal. Will that cause their business to languish? Will not that, on the contrary, be an incentive for them to push their works to a still greater extent than they have already pushed them? Are not these men to be satisfied with what we have already done? Is it possible that they are not willing to allow us to deliberate two or three months to see how this bill may affect our interests; but after having succeeded in inducing Congress to relieve them from these burdens, as they considered them, will they still insist that we must pass another bill specially for their benefit and to our disadvantage?

But the Senator talks a great deal about the pauper labor of Europe. I have heard a great deal of that kind of discussion upon the stump. Sir, I stand here as the representative of the laboring man quite as much as the Senator from Ohio, and it is not to be thrown in my teeth that I am not as willing as he, or as anybody else, to protect the laboring man. I do not stand here as the representative of a class. I do not stand here as the representative of the wool-growers alone, who, among my constituents, are not more than one in a thousand. How is this wool duty, which the Senator says has come to us all prepared, the judge's notes drawn out, and all that is necessary for us to do is merely to reduce the thing to form, and then we have discharged our duty and can go quietly home? Why, sir, they induced the western wool-growers, it seems, to consent to a slight change in the classification of wool by which there will be an increased duty of four or five per cent. The wool-growers tell me that it will increase the value of their article, they suppose, five cents a pound, not more; and what then? They have got that change made in order to protect the wool-grower from introducing what is called the mestiza wool from South America and the Cape of Good Hope, which, coming in a very dirty condition, is of low value, but when cleansed and scoured competes with our wool and makes the same kind of fabric that the American wool does. The wool manufacturer says, "We will consent to this addition to your duty, but you must consent to add forty per cent. to the duty on the woolen fabric when it is made;" and that is done. Now, does it not strike the Senator from Ohio that the wool manufacturer, if he can get that additional duty upon his manufactured fabric, can afford to pay for the mestiza wool under this tariff just as much as he could afford to pay for it under the old tariff? Where, I ask the Senator from Ohio, is the advantage to the wool-grower under that condition of things? The manufacturer gets the additional duty that you impose upon the foreign wool; and then what is the condition of the consumers, who I say here are as nine hundred and ninety-nine in this country to one producer of wool? They are compelled to pay the burden that is put upon wool, and then compelled to pay the burden that is also imposed upon the woolen fabric; and with the passage of such a bill as this, an ordinary coat, such as the Senator and I wear in the winter season, would cost from $100 to $200 I expect, or something in that neighborhood.

Mr. President, I have not come here to represent the wool-growers. I come here to represent the mass of the people of my State who wear the woolen fabric when it is made up into goods; and they do not tell me to vote for any such provision as this. They do not tell me to put three dollars a thousand on lumber which is to go into the houses and to fence the farms on the western prairies, for the sake of getting any such tax as this on wool. They do not tell me to agree to put fifty dollars a ton on iron, which goes into their wagons and their plows and their harrows for the sake of getting a little advantage to a few wool-growers. They do not tell me to oppress the mass of the people for the sake of securing an advantage to a select few. Sir, the wool-growers of my State are intelligent men. They have never asked me nor my colleague to vote for any such bill as this. They do not want us to do it. They would repudiate us, and I believe justly repuddate us, if we imposed such a bill as this upon them.

The Senator talks about British free-trade agents, and says that British gold has been distributed among members, perhaps, or among agents—

Mr. WADE. I did not say any such thing.

Mr. GRIMES. The Senator spoke about British gold being used to influence the legislation of Congress. That was his idea.

Mr. WADE. I said what I believe to be true, that it subsidized papers, printed books, and hired traveling agents to disseminate their free-trade system.

Mr. CLARK. It sends documents here every day.

Mr. WADE. I get them every day.

Mr. CLARK. My mail is full of them.

Mr. GRIMES. I can only say that this British free-trade institution knows what Senators to apply to, for it has never applied to me on the subject; it never sends its communications to me. And let me say to the Senator that I was raised as a tariff protection Whig, and I still entertain the same notions in regard to tariffs as those in which I was early educated, and am just as much in favor of a tariff as the Senator from Ohio is; but I am not in favor of this tariff, nor am I in favor of any tariff except the one that is now upon our statute-books, until we can see what may be the operation of our internal revenue law that we have already passed. I know nothing about this British Free-Trade League. I know there is a Free-Trade League in New York, of which I have heard, and I have seen some publications that have been made by that organization. My mind has not been influenced in the slightest degree by what they have said; nor has it been influenced by another organization gotten up by the iron and coal men of Pennsylvania, whose agent is about these Halls, and has been here since this subject has been under consideration, using his influence with members to induce them to vote for this bill. I do not know but that the free-trade men have just as inherent a right to organize, make publications, raise money, disseminate information, and control public sentiment in Congress or out of it, as have the men who are in favor of the passage of such a bill as this. I supposed that any citizens of this country had a right to entertain their own notions upon this or any other subject, and had the right to impress them upon their fellow-citizens in any honest and legitimate way.

The Senator says that he wants this tariff bill to pass. How long does the Senator suppose it will remain upon our statute-books if we do pass it? Does he not know that if it is discovered, as I believe it will be, that it is improperly adjusted to our internal revenue law it will be repealed and another one substituted for it in December, or when we assemble together again? Is it to the interest of the manufacturers themselves that the tariff law should be changed at every session of Congress? If I were a manufacturer of anything I would implore this Congress to let this bill rest where it is, and when we shall have come together again in December and have seen what is the condition of our foreign trade, what is the condition in which the passage of the internal revenue law has placed us, and seen, also, what we are going to do in regard to the currency of the country, then I would come before Congress and ask them to pass such a law with a view to having it remain permanently on the statute-book, as I would be able to conduct my business under it with some view to permanency. I will tell the Senator that some of the largest manufacturers in this country—I know one man, a citizen of Massachusetts, a man of immense wealth, a millionaire; the largest portion of whose property is in the coal and iron fields of Pennsylvania and Maryland, who has written to the effect that he does not want this bill to pass, but would prefer that it should be postponed until further consideration can be given to it by Congress; and I say that that man, in my view, has exercised a wise discretion in desiring it to be postponed.

Mr. President, if I have betrayed any unnecessary heat in the course of this discussion I desire the Senate to remember that this is a question which in my opinion—I may be wrong—is vital to the interests of the State that I have the honor in part to represent. I say that the passage of this bill in anything like the shape in which it is now lying upon your table will be ruinous to the prosperity of Iowa. In view of the considerations that I have presented, in view of the fact that at the best we cannot pass this bill until some time in August, and that all the postponement that I ask is for three or four months, until we can come together again, when we shall understand the operation of the laws bearing upon the questions of finance that we have already passed—in view of all these considerations I do hope that the Senate will agree to its postponement.

Mr. GUTHRIE. Mr. President, I feel inclined to vote for this postponement: The present existing tariff is surely high enough. Under the tariff as it stands we have collected during the last year $170,000,000. That is almost double the amount of tariff duties that we collected in prosperous times before the war. I do not object to the amount; I do not desire to see it reduced until I can see a fair expectation of our funding our national debt, to provide for its interest, and to commence the work of reduction.

I understand that this new tariff bill goes upon the predication that the tariff is too low; that we are importing too many goods; that we are obtaining too much money, and that we will repress the importations by an increase of duties. It will have that effect, in my judgment, and if we pass it we shall not get as much from this tariff by nearly one half, if not quite, as we get under the existing tariff. I do not see how we can spare the money in the present exigency of the times. Gentlemen may lament over the exportation of the specie that we have taken from our mines. I have no lamentations for that. It is the product of labor; it is part of our national income; and we have as much right to seize upon that to pay for our foreign importations as any production of the Northwest or any production of the South or the accumulated wealth and hoardings of the North. They are all within the range of the annual production of the country.

I desire to have this bill postponed because I want to see the operation of the tax bill and the reductions that we have made there, and how a large and increased tariff, such as this is, reducing our income from importations, will square with the means that we have provided to pay our interest, how it will affect the funding of our debt, and how it will operate upon that interest. I cannot see that it is going to operate in any way beneficially to the great consuming interests. If this tariff reduces the foreign importations, to some extent it will increase the consumption of domestic manufactures and productions; but will it cheapen them? No, for the price will be put on to bring them just within the tariff that you impose upon them, and the great consuming interests of the United States will fail to be relieved, though the Government will be relieved of the income that we had for the payment of the national debt.

I think we should be careful in investigating the bearing of this measure, not only in connection with the new tax bill and the reduction of the revenue, but in relation to the different sections of the country. Having relieved railroad iron from the domestic tax imposed upon our manufactures, I do not want them to put more than that on the price of their domestic article by increasing that duty. I believe they can live and prosper under the present tariff. Besides, there are a great many goods in this country, and if we increase the tariff the importers will claim the advance; they will exact it; and we shall be legislating it into their pockets. This matter of interfering with the tax laws materially, as this bill does, is a very serious thing to the commerce and trade of the country. What is to be the effect of peace upon our foreign commerce? It has been substantially broken and destroyed during the war.

Besides, I want to go home. I am one of those "childish" men that the gentleman from Ohio mentions. I do not think it will do me any harm to go home and breathe my native air, and talk with my constituents on the subject of this tariff. I have always inculcated the doctrine that the national debt should be paid, that the honor of the nation is involved in it, and that provision should be made for it certain and sure. We should never act upon any other calculation than that every dollar of it is to be paid, for the honor and credit of the nation are involved. I want, even in this thing, to have an opportunity to say to my constituents, "So far as my voice could be raised in favor of the payment of the national debt and the saving of the honor of the Union I have discharged my duty." I want to bring to their attention the bearings that this extravagant tariff, as I believe, shutting up our ports and destroying and limiting our foreign trade, will have upon their future interests. Sir, I want the United States to compete for the commerce of the world as she did before. Her sails whitened every sea; her ships reached every country, and obtained for us that proportion of wealth to which we were entitled as a great, industrious, commercial people in comparison with other nations.

I do not think it will do us any harm or the country any harm to postpone the consideration of this measure until the next session. The gentleman from Ohio thinks we are shirking our duty if we postpone it, and that we are ready to consider it. If gentlemen had been as hasty in settling the great point of interest, the restoration of all the States to their relations with the Union, they would not deny us three months more about this thing; they would consider that we needed it for its proper consideration. We have been thinking about other things during the year than the question of the tariff, except, perhaps, some few gentlemen who have brought it in in the other House, where the bill was bound to originate. I am sure it will do us no harm to postpone it and consider it, and it will do the country no harm. I believe it will result in a material modification of this measure to the great interests of the people and the commerce of the country.

Mr. WILSON. I do not know when the vote will be taken on this question, and I ask the unanimous consent of the Senate to introduce a resolution which it is very important should be passed to-day.

Several SENATORS. Let us take the vote now.

Mr. WILSON. Very well; if the vote is to be taken, I will not insist on introducing the resolution now.

Mr. COWAN. I suppose it is not necessary that I should say anything in order that my opinions may be made public upon the subject now under consideration. I am sorry that this question is presented to us at this late time in the session for our consideration; but as I believe it is an important measure, one vital to the interests of the country, I think we should not now avoid giving to it that attention which it deserves. I had thought that when we were obliged to levy a large amount by internal taxation upon the industrial resources of the country, the vexed question of the tariff would be settled, and settled, perhaps, finally. It seems, however, that it is not. At the same time, I cannot but think gentlemen must see the necessity of adjusting the tariff so as to make it correspond with our internal system of taxation. It seems to me perfectly clear that if we, for instance, levy two dollars a gallon on whisky, it would be madness to admit the importation of whisky free. Everybody knows that that would be to destroy our own manufacture and to put into the hands of foreigners the control of the market of that article; and so it is with a thousand other things; in fact, I may say everything. There is not a manufacture in the country from one end to the other that is not more or less affected by our internal revenue laws. Everything now costs two or three times as much as it did six years ago. The production of every article, no matter what, costs in the same ratio. If we are to be exposed to foreign importations under these circumstances, what is the consequence? The foreigner reaps all the advantage that is to be achieved by our inconvenient condition. Under these circumstances I think it is our duty so to adjust our tariff of imposts as that it will protect the manufacturer here, not only against the pauper labor of Europe, not only against the greater abundance of capital there and its cheapness, but that we must protect it against those burdens under which it labors on account of the fact that we are so heavily taxed here at home.

Now, sir, in order to the fair and proper adjustment of the tariff for the purpose of protecting our own people, in order that they may not suffer from the fact that a heavy debt is imposed upon us which we are obliged to pay by internal taxation, I think it is only prudent that we should take this subject up and consider it, and give it that careful and prudent attention which it deserves. I am not in favor of monopolies; I am not in favor, exactly, of a tariff merely for protection; I would rather call it a tariff for self-defense. I would not have the American manufacturer receive bounties; but I would have him put upon an equal footing with his neighbors, and I would not allow him to be crushed out and sacrificed by some factitious happening of certain fancies at home.

I think, in a very short time, if the progress of the world keeps pace as it has done for perhaps the last quarter of a century, we shall be relieved of a great many of the difficulties which surround this question. I think there will be an equalization all over the world in the price of labor in a very short time. When it happens that the laborer can seek the highest market for that which he brings into it, the same as merchandise now seeks it, then we shall be relieved of that which has heretofore annoyed us—competition with the pauper labor of Europe. A very great change has recently taken place in that respect. Formerly the laborer was almost chained to the spot which gave him birth. He could not get away from it, and he was there ground down to the subsistence point. But recent improvements have enabled him to get away, and he now goes to Australia with more facility than he used to come to this country. When he came to this country formerly, it took him a hundred days before he could colonize a hundred miles away from the coast. By our recent improvements, inaugurated by our western friends in the shape of Pacific railroads, and all that kind of thing, he is thrust, the moment he lands on our shores, into the heart of the wilderness; and he is offered a fine farm, and if you please, a mine to satisfy his cupidity. So it is with capital. Capital is finding its places of investment all over the world with much more readiness than it has hitherto done. I think that all we need is a fair and honest exercise of the power of the Government in its right to levy imposts, so that we may keep our industry as far as possible at home.

I am rather inclined to think that the general law, not only of the family, but of nations, is this, that whenever we go abroad to purchase that which we could ourselves produce, in the same proportion we shall have a sufficient number of idlers who, if they were at work, would produce that which we go abroad to buy. It may be a singular proposition, but I am rather inclined to think that it can be sustained from the experience of the past. Why is it that New England has been more industrious than Pennsylvania? It is only because her industry has been more varied. No man is naturally idle if you give him that which he wants to work at, that which he wants to do; and if he lives in a community where all kinds of operations are going on, where all the varieties of things necessary to satisfy human wants are being made, he will have something to do, and he will find that which is congenial to him to do. And I may ask why it was that the inhabitants of Pennsylvania were more industrious than the people of the South were. In the South there was nothing but planting and farming going on, and of course all men who did not find it according to their tastes to engage in planting or farming did nothing, and therefore the number of idlers was certainly sufficient, if they had been set to work, to produce all that which the South would have needed to come from abroad; and they would have been so much richer to-day on that account.

I think it is the policy of the American people so to regulate their excises and their imposts that everything which they can produce of themselves they should produce here instead of going abroad to purchase it; and in that way all their people will be employed, and all will grow rich in consequence. Why should my friend from Iowa go abroad to buy railroad iron? He is not buying railroad iron exactly. What is the composition of a ton of railroad iron? It is not a certain amount of iron ore exactly. If you take the trouble to take down a ton of railroad iron and unroll it you will get out of it a stack of hay; you will get out of it a few dozen bags of oats; you will get out of it two or three fat hogs; you will get out of it a barrel of flour; and you will get out of it, I believe, about forty days of human labor. The iron ore which enters into the composition of it is the very smallest part of it; the rest is labor and agricultural products. Does he desire that labor shall be imported into this country in order to compete with Iowa labor? Does he desire that barrels of flour shall be imported into this country in order to compete with Iowa flour or oats or hay or pork or beef or even whisky, because I believe Mr. Morell, of my neighborhood, who manages the largest single mill in the world, says it requires two gallons of whisky to make a ton of railroad iron, or at least that two gallons of whisky are absorbed in the manufacture of that article. Now if my honorable friend will just take into consideration the constituent elements of a ton of iron he will see that in protecting it as against the foreigner, he is protecting the productions of his own people.

Mr. POMEROY. I should like to ask the Senator if he thinks putting railroad iron on the free list in the tax bill is not a sufficient protection to the producer now. I was told that the internal revenue tax was about eight dollars a ton. Four or five Pennsylvania manufacturers called upon me last year, when we were putting on that tax, and told me that the internal revenue tax would cost them eight dollars a ton, directly and indirectly. Now, we took that all off in the tax bill just passed. One of your manufacturers also told me that last year he paid $250,000 to the Government as internal revenue tax from his manufactory alone. That is all taken off. If he was able to manufacture at all last year, that $250,000 divided among the hands this year will be quite an item, even without any tariff. My point, therefore, is simply to know if putting iron on the free list is not a sufficient protection.

Mr. COWAN. If iron was actually and in fact put upon the free list, perhaps it might be a sufficient protection; but iron is not put upon the free list, except nominally. Iron itself is put upon the free list; but all the elements which enter into the composition of iron are taxed. Everything that the laborer eats, almost everything that the laborer wears, is taxed. Every part of it and almost every element of it is subject to a tax indirectly, not directly, I agree. But it is enough to say, in answer to the question, that the prices of almost everything in the country are doubled, sometimes they are trebled; and it requires no especial sagacity on the part of any man to see that if in the country itself you double or treble or quadruple the prices of commodities generally, you increase the cost of manufacturing in the same proportion; you increase the cost of production in the same proportion. It is notorious that you cannot employ a laborer now for less than two or three times what you could have employed him for five or six years ago. You cannot get anything that he eats, anything that he wears, without paying two or three prices for it. So it is with everything. The standard of value rises uniformly. It is like water; it finds its level over a large space at the same time; and whenever you affect one of the elements you affect all the rest. Hence it is not true that exempting iron eo nomine, or by name, from a tax is a sufficient protection as against the foreign producer, all other things being equal; because while you exempt it you subject to extraordinary burdens all the elements that enter into its composition, and it is well that that be taken into the account.

Mr. President, I am admonished by some friends near me that I am sufficiently understood upon this question; and as I have no fancy at this stage of the session or at my stage of life to make a speech merely for the sake of a speech, I shall consider the admonition in a friendly spirit and say no more.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The question is on the amendment of the Senator from Iowa to the motion of the Senator from Maine.

The question being taken by yeas and nays, resulted—yeas 23, nays 17; as follows:

YEAS—Messrs. Brown, Davis, Doolittle, Foster, Grimes, Guthrie, Harris, Henderson, Hendricks, Johnson, Kirkwood, Lane of Indiana, Morgan, Nesmith, Norton, Pomerooy, Riddle, Saulsbury, Sumner, Trumbull, Willey, Williams, and Wilson—23.

NAYS—Messrs. Anthony, Chandler, Clark, Conness, Cowan, Cragin, Edmunds, Fessenden, Howard, Howe, Poland, Ramsey, Sherman, Sprague, Stewart, Van Winkle, and Wade—17.

ABSENT—Messrs. Buckalew, Creswell, Dixon, Lane of Kansas, McDougall, Morrill, Nye, Wright, and Yates—9.

So the amendment to the motion was agreed to.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The question now is on the motion, as amended, to refer this bill to the Committee on Finance, and that the committee be instructed to postpone their report until the second Wednesday in December next.

The motion, as amended, was agreed to.

Mr. SHERMAN. I desire to offer a resolution in connection with this same subject, the reading of which will explain itself, and to which I know there will be no objection.

The Secretary read the resolution, as follows:

Resolved, That the Secretary of the Treasury is instructed to cause to be prepared a statement showing, in tabular form, the duties levied on different articles of imported goods under the several tariffs since the tariff act of 1842, and including in such tables the duties proposed by the tariff act now pending in the Senate; and that he report the same to the Senate at the beginning of its next session, with such further information as he may possess as to the proper duties on imported goods.

The resolution was considered by unanimous consent, and agreed to.

Mr. SHERMAN. In connection with the same matter, I desire to submit a motion that one thousand extra copies of the tariff bill be printed.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. That motion will go to the Committee on Printing, under the rule.

BILL INTRODUCED.

Mr. BROWN asked, and by unanimous consent obtained, leave to introduce a bill (S. No. 421) to authorize the construction of a submerged tubular bridge across the Mississippi river at St. Louis; which was read twice by its title and referred to the Committee on Post Offices and Post Roads.

RELIEF OF PORTLAND SUFFERERS.

Mr. WILSON. I ask the unanimous consent of the Senate to introduce a joint resolution.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The bill reported by the Senator from Nevada, [Mr. STEWART,] which was laid aside by common consent, is before the Senate, and nothing can be received, except by unanimous consent, until that is disposed of. The Senator from Massachusetts offers a resolution. Is there any objection to its being received?

Mr. WILSON. I ask that it be read by its title, and then I do not think there can be any objection to it.

The joint resolution (S. R. No. 129) to authorize the President to place at the disposal of the authorities of Portland, Maine, tents, camp and hospital furniture, and clothing for the use of families rendered houseless by the late fire, was read a first time and passed to a second reading.

Mr. CLARK. I hope that will be considered and passed at the present time.

Mr. WILSON. I ask for its present consideration. I desire to have it passed to-day, if possible.

By unanimous consent, the joint resolution was read the second time and considered as in Committee of the Whole. It authorizes the President of the United States to place at the disposal (without charge) of the city authorities of Portland, Maine, such clothing condemned or ordered to be sold, and such surplus camp and garrison equipage, bedding, and hospital furniture on hand as can be spared by the Army, for the use of families rendered houseless and destitute by the recent conflagration; and it is to be the duty of the quartermaster's department to deliver these articles at Portland, and receive and properly dispose of them when no longer needed.

Mr. WILSON. I have a letter here from General Meigs, in which it is stated that the Government has a large amount of condemned clothing ordered to be sold on the 28th of this month. They have all these other articles on hand in great abundance, and they can be used now for a good purpose and will cost the Government very little. It is a matter of humanity, and I hope that no Senator will oppose it.

Mr. HOWE. I will suggest to the Senator that the quartermasters ought to be required to take a receipt from the mayor; otherwise there will be no way of settling their accounts.

Mr. WILSON. They will take care of that.

Mr. HOWE. But the resolution does not make the receipt of the mayor evidence. The quartermasters are charged with this property, and the resolution ought to make somebody's receipt evidence that they have properly disposed of it.

Mr. CONNESS. That is matter of administration.

Mr. CLARK. The authority to give it is sufficient for that purpose.

Mr. HOWE. What is the evidence that they do not credit themselves with twice the amount they actually deliver over to the city?

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The joint resolution is open to amendment.

Mr. HOWE. The resolution is not printed, and I have it not in my hand, but I move that it be so amended as to require the quartermaster to take a receipt of the mayor of the city.

Mr. WILSON. I have no objection to that. I take it the quartermaster at any rate will keep an accurate account of what he delivers there, because after they have been used they are to be returned to him, such as can be returned. He is to take care of them. Many of the articles will be worn out.

Mr. HOWE. He should have some vouchers by which to settle his accounts.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. It is moved to amend the resolution by inserting after the word "Portland" the words, "and to take a receipt for the same of the mayor of said city."

The amendment was agreed to.

The joint resolution was reported to the Senate as amended, and the amendment was concurred in. The joint resolution was ordered to be engrossed for a third reading, was read the third time, and passed.

MINORITY REPORT ON RECONSTRUCTION.

Mr. ANTHONY. The Committee on Printing to whom was referred a resolution for the printing of fifty thousand extra copies of the views of the minority of the joint committee of fifteen appointed to inquire into the condition of the States which formed the so-called confederate States of America on the subjects treated of in the report submitted to the Senate on the 8th of June, have instructed me to report it back without amendment and recommend its passage. I ask for its present consideration.

By unanimous consent, the Senate proceeded to consider the following resolution:

Resolved, That fifty thousand additional copies of the views of the minority of the joint committee of fifteen be printed to accompany the report made by that committee on the 8th of June.

Mr. POMEROY. I ask what is meant by having it "accompany" the other report. Is it to be put in the same volume?

Mr. ANTHONY. It cannot accompany the other report, because the other report has been printed and distributed.

Mr. POMEROY. I do not want this to accompany any that I have got. I have no objection to its being printed as a sort of appendix.

Mr. ANTHONY. The resolution may be so amended as to omit those words. It cannot accompany the other report, because that has been distributed.

Mr. FESSENDEN. As they will have to be printed separately, the phraseology of the resolution had better be changed.

Mr. ANTHONY. I move to amend the resolution by striking out that part which speaks of this document accompanying the majority report and inserting the words "for the use of the Senate."

The amendment was agreed to.

Mr. SUMNER. I think we should prefix to the publication of this document the resolution of the Senate that was adopted on the motion of the Senator from Illinois, [Mr. TRUMBULL,] stating the character of the document, and I move that that resolution be prefixed to it. I presume there will be no objection to this.

Mr. DOOLITTLE. I should like to know what that resolution is.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The resolution referred to is not on the table of the Senate.

Mr. CONNESS. It was a resolution giving the consent of the Senate to the reception of the document.

Mr. SUMNER. Senators do not seem to think it necessary; I will not press it.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The question is on the resolution.

Mr. HOWARD. I wish to inquire of the chairman of the Committee on Printing what number of copies of the report of the majority of that committee was published.

Mr. ANTHONY. The same number. It has been customary, when we printed the views of a minority at all, to print the same number that is printed of the majority report. In the House of Representatives they go together. This was not presented here until some time after the printing of the report was ordered; but although the number is very large, we thought it was but following the usual practice, and was according to the common courtesy, and the expense is not very great.

Mr. HOWARD. Courtesy of course would require me to vote for the printing of the number proposed by the resolution of the report of the minority; but at the same time I take occasion to say that I regard that document, so far as it undertakes to inculcate principles of constitutional law with reference to the seceded States and the effect of the civil war upon the rebellious States as, in my judgment, a very dangerous document. I certainly have read no document recently, emanating from a Union-loving author which, in my judgment, strikes so heavy a blow at what I regard as the sound and permanent principles of the Constitution as does that report of the minority. If the question were put to me whether I would pay out the public money for the circulation of that document, and the question was entirely aside from all considerations of courtesy, I certainly would not vote a dollar nor a cent to put it in circulation.

The resolution was agreed to.

MESSAGE FROM THE HOUSE.

A message from the House of Representatives, by Mr. McPHERSON, its Clerk, announced that the House had passed, without amendment, the joint resolution (S. R. No. 129) to authorize the President to place at the disposal of the authorities of Portland, Maine, tents, camp and hospital furniture, and clothing for the use of families rendered houseless by the late fire, and the bill (S. No. 369) to establish certain post roads.

The message also announced that the House insisted upon its tenth amendment disagreed to by the Senate to the bill (S. No. 348) to quiet land titles in California and asked a conference on the disagreeing vote of the two Houses, and had appointed Mr. JOHN BIDWELL of California, Mr. G. W. JULIAN of Indiana, and Mr. G. W. ANDERSON of Missouri, managers at the conference on its part.

The message also announced that the House had concurred in some and had non-concurred in other amendments of the Senate to the bill (H. R. No. 218) making appropriations for the legislative, executive, and judicial expenses of the Government for the year ending 30th June, 1867, asked a conference on the disagreeing votes of the two Houses thereon, and had appointed Mr. THADDEUS STEVENS of Pennsylvania, Mr. J. A. KASSON of Iowa, and Mr. W. E. FINCK of Ohio, managers at the conference on its part.

ENROLLED BILLS SIGNED.

The message also announced that the Speaker of the House had signed the enrolled bill (S. No. 367) to aid in the construction of telegraph lines, and to secure to the Government the use of the same for postal, military, and other purposes; and the enrolled joint resolution (S. R. No. 129) to authorize the President to place at the disposal of the authorities of Portland, Maine, tents, camp and hospital furniture, and clothing for the use of families rendered houseless by the late fire; and they were signed by the President pro tempore.

DITCHES, ETC., IN PACIFIC STATES.

Mr. HOWE. I move that the Senate proceed to the consideration of House bill No. 344.

Mr. CONNESS. I beg leave to remind the Senator that there is already a pending question which was laid aside informally and which will only occupy a few minutes. I hope that will be first disposed of.

Mr. STEWART. I hope so. We have given way ever since fifteen minutes past twelve o'clock.

Mr. HOWE. If there is a bill before the Senate I do not press my motion now.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The bill (H. R. No. 365) granting the right of way to ditch and canal owners over the public lands in the States of California, Oregon, and Nevada, is before the Senate as in Committee of the Whole, the question being on the amendment reported by the Committee on Public Lands.

The Secretary read the amendment, which was to strike out all of the bill after the enacting clause, and insert the following as a substitute:

That whenever by priority of possession rights to the use of water for mining, agricultural, manufacturing, or other purposes, have vested and accrued, and the same are recognized and acknowledged by the local customs, laws, and the decisions of the courts, the possessors and owners of such vested rights shall be maintained and protected in the same, and the right of way for the construction of ditches and canals for the purpose aforesaid is hereby acknowledged and confirmed: Provided, however, That, whenever after the passage of this act any person or persons shall, in the construction of any ditch or canal, injure or damage the possession of any settler on the public domain, the party committing such injury or damage shall be liable to the parties injured for such injury or damage.

The amendment was agreed to.

Mr. STEWART. It is desirable, perhaps, that another amendment be made, and, to give time to consider it, I move that the bill be postponed for the present.

The motion was agreed to.

LEGISLATIVE, ETC., APPROPRIATION BILL.

Mr. FESSENDEN. I move to take up the message from the House relative to the legislative, executive, and judicial appropriation bill, in order that we may agree to the conference proposed.

The motion was agreed to; and the Senate proceeded to consider its amendments to House bill No. 213.

Mr. FESSENDEN. I move that the Senate insist on the amendments disagreed to by the House and agree to the conference proposed by the House.

The motion was agreed to.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore was authorized, by unanimous consent, to appoint the conferees on the part of the Senate, and Messrs. FESSENDEN, WILLIAMS, and HENDRICKS were appointed.

THE MARBLE ROOM.

Mr. DAVIS. I offer this resolution and ask for its consideration:

Resolved, That any Senator having occasion to confer with any person on business shall have the privilege of the Marble Room for such conference.

This is for the convenience of all of us, and I hope it will be adopted.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. Is there any objection to the consideration of the resolution?

Mr. FESSENDEN. I should like to understand the meaning of it.

Mr. DAVIS. The Marble Room is now closed against persons having business with Senators. The object is simply that the officers may allow Senators conferring with individuals upon business to have the use of the Marble Room for that purpose.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. No objection being made, the resolution is before the Senate.

Mr. DAVIS. The effect of it will be simply this: if a stranger or an acquaintance sends a message to a Senator that he wants to confer with him on business, the Senator shall have the privilege of taking that individual into the Marble Room for conference. It does not extend beyond that privilege.

Mr. HOWE. I hope my friend from Kentucky will let the resolution lie over as it is evidently going to lead to debate.

Mr. FESSENDEN. I hope the Senator from Kentucky will consent to let it lie over until to-morrow, that we may have a chance to think it over.

Mr. DAVIS. Very well; I will consent to let it lie over.

CALIFORNIA LAND TITLES.

On motion of Mr. CONNESS, the Senate proceeded to consider the message of the House relative to the bill (S. No. 343) to quiet land titles in California.

Mr. CONNESS. I move that the Senate insist on its disagreement to the tenth amendment of the House to that bill and agree to the conference asked by the House.

The motion was agreed to; and the President pro tempore being by unanimous consent authorized to appoint the committee on the part of the Senate, Messrs. POMEROY, CONNESS, and SPRAGUE were appointed.

NIAGARA SHIP-CANAL.

On motion of Mr. HOWE, the Senate, as in Committee of the Whole, resumed the consideration of the bill (H. R. No. 344) to incorporate the Niagara Ship-Canal Company, the pending question being on the amendment reported by the Committee on Commerce to add the following proviso to section twenty-one:

And provided further, That no money shall be loaned to said corporation by the United States, nor borrowed by it from any other source, until the full sum of $2,000,000 subscribed to its capital stock shall have been collected and in good faith expended upon the construction of said work, which expenditure shall be duly verified by the oaths of the president and engineers aforesaid, and thereafter such loan shall be advanced only upon the terms and conditions in this section prescribed: And provided further, That all interest accrued on any bond to be issued to said corporation by the United States under the provisions of this act prior to the date of its delivery shall be duly canceled prior to its delivery.

The amendment was agreed to.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. All the amendments reported by the Committee on Commerce have now been disposed of.

Mr. HOWE. The amendment reported as the twenty-eighth section has not been acted on.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Chair understands that the record shows that that amendment was amended by striking out "one year" and inserting "two years," and then adopted.

Mr. HOWE. I move to amend the twenty-first section by striking out in the third line "three hundred thousand" and inserting "two million."

The amendment was agreed to.

Mr. HOWE. I further move to amend the same section by inserting the word "so" at the end of the eighteenth line.

The amendment was agreed to.

Mr. HOWE. I move to amend the section further by striking out all after the word "treasurer," in the twentieth line, down to and including the word "aforesaid," in the twenty-fourth line.

The words proposed to be stricken out were read, as follows:

To the amount of $200,000 at a time, or such parts thereof as may be necessary to make the whole sum hereby ordered and directed to be loaned upon such certificates and proof of expenditure as aforesaid.

The amendment was agreed to.

Mr. HOWE. I move to amend the twenty-second section by striking out the word "ten," in the third line, and inserting "twenty."

The amendment was agreed to.

Mr. HOWE. I move further to amend the twenty-second section by adding to it these words: "and such application shall be made annually until the whole sum loaned by the Government, with annual interest thereon at six per cent. per annum, shall be repaid."

The amendment was agreed to.

Mr. HOWE. I move to amend the first section by striking out in the twentieth and twenty-first lines the words "the use of the United States for the purpose aforesaid" and inserting "that use."

The amendment was agreed to.

Mr. HOWE. I move to amend the twelfth section, on page 12 of the bill, by striking out all after the word "States," in line one hundred and six, and to including "sixty-four," in line one hundred and nine.

The words proposed to be stricken out were read, as follows:

Which shall not exceed the rates of toll or charges imposed on vessels and property passing through the Welland canal, in Canada West, in the year 1864.

The amendment was agreed to.

Mr. HOWE. Now, to conform to that, the words "instead of the limit to the toll above provided," in line one hundred and eleven, should be stricken out.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. That correction will be made to make the bill correspond with the previous amendment.

Mr. TRUMBULL. I am under the impression that section twenty-eight has never been agreed to. It certainly was not agreed to when I was present, and it is a section which I regard as important, perhaps vital to the bill itself. I think that could not have been agreed to. If it was done it must have been done inadvertently. That is the section which declares that the act shall not take effect unless the Legislature of the State of New York shall, within two years from the date hereof, give its assent thereto. There was an alteration made in the section, but if any vote was taken upon the section itself it certainly escaped my notice. I think no such vote was taken.

Mr. HOWARD. There was no vote at all taken upon it except upon the verbal amendment.

Mr. TRUMBULL. That was all.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. (Mr. HARRIS in the chair.) The Chair is informed by the Secretary that the record shows that that amendment was agreed to.

Mr. HOWARD. I am quite sure that the Senate have not voted on this section twenty-eight.

Mr. HOWE. My recollection coincides with the statements of the Senator from Illinois and the Senator from Michigan. My recollection is that we proceeded with all the amendments reported by the committee, passing over the one to the twenty-first section, to which our attention was called on resuming the consideration of the bill to-day; but when we reached the amendment proposed by the committee as the twenty-eighth section I stated that the Senator from Maine [Mr. MORRILL] felt great interest in that question, and that it was deemed desirable that he should be here when it was considered, and therefore it was laid over.

Mr. TRUMBULL. The fact about it is, I presume—and I understand that is the way it is reported in the Globe—that after this verbal amendment was made changing "one year" to "two years" it was suggested by the Senator from Wisconsin that the Senator from Maine was peculiarly interested in this section, and thereupon it went over without having been acted upon. It is very natural that an incorrect entry may have been made, because there was an agreement to an amendment to the amendment changing "one year" to "two years." I think that is the condition of it; but as there seems to be a misunderstanding about it, I presume there will be no objection to a reconsideration of it, so as to bring it before the Senate.

Mr. HOWE. The question will come up again before the Senate, anyhow, on concurring in the amendment.

Mr. TRUMBULL. We can try it in the Senate, and that, perhaps, will be sufficient.

Mr. GRIMES. How does it stand now?

Mr. TRUMBULL. It stands now with that section in the bill, but I do not think we ever voted upon it.

Mr. HOWE. The twenty-third section, I understand, was not stricken out.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The amendment reported by the committee proposing to strike out that section was rejected.

Mr. HOWE. I move to amend the section by striking out, in the third and fourth lines, the words "once in every five years after the completion of said canal" and inserting "at any time after eight years from its completion, and once in five years thereafter."

Mr. TRUMBULL. Why prolong it to eight years?

Mr. HOWE. I will simply say that inasmuch as the paying qualities of the enterprise are presumed to be matter of experiment, to some extent, the capitalists who put their money in ought to be allowed to fix their own rates of toll for at least eight years. That is controlled by other provisions which allow the Government to purchase the work at any time at the cost price, with ten per cent. added.

Mr. TRUMBULL. I should prefer leaving the provision as it is.

The amendment was rejected.

Mr. HOWARD. I move to amend the bill on page 12 by inserting after the word "gunboats," in line ninety-one of section eight the words "ships-of-war of all kinds," so as to remove any possible ambiguity which might arise from the language of the clause in its present form, and to cover that class of craft beyond all doubt.

The amendment was agreed to.

Mr. MORGAN. I move to postpone the further consideration of this bill until the second Tuesday in December next, and if this motion prevails I intend to follow it with a resolution providing for the obtainment of estimates from the engineer department. There are many reasons why this bill should be postponed, and I hope the Senate will consent to postpone it. The question of power, in the first place, is not one to be trifled with. The question of power is one that ought to be well considered by the Senate, because the principle involved is, whether Congress has the power to create a private corporation within one of the States of the Union, the franchise to be exercised solely in that State. Perhaps the Senate will decide that Congress have that power; but if they do so decide, the decision will, I think, be in conflict with the best opinions of the early statesmen, and in conflict also with the practice of the Government for nearly eighty years. A bill which proposes that the Congress of the United States shall create a private corporation and authorize it to build a canal around the falls of Niagara, in the State of New York, for ships to navigate the water or to go through the air, as this bill provides, and which appropriates $6,000,000 from the Treasury of the United States to the private corporation thus created, without ever having any survey or reliable estimate from the engineer department of the Government as to the cost, whether it will be $6,000,000 or $30,000,000, and without knowing whether the project is feasible or not, and without having shown any public necessity for it, and this as a commercial measure, for commercial purposes, in time of peace, when the country is borne down with enormous taxation, is, to say the least of it, a measure of a very grave character, and which, it appears to me, should not be entertained for a moment if we expect to retain the confidence and respect of the country as wise and prudent legislators.

The State of New York is entitled to some voice in this matter. It seems to me that it would be entirely proper to give as long a time as is proposed, until December next, on that account, for that State has public works that are to be jeopardized, perhaps destroyed; and it is not for the interest of Senators representing western States to undertake any measure that shall result in disaster to the Erie canal. There has been one deliberate, well-considered, but bold attempt to sell the Erie canal to a large and powerful corporation. That was made a little less than ten years ago. It failed then, but it may be made again. If this bill passes, and this ship-canal is built and is successful, and a large portion of the transportation is taken from the Erie canal to this ship-canal, there will come up a cry from all parts of the State to sell the Erie canal, to have the constitution amended and have the canal sold, as has been done in the State of Pennsylvania. That will come whenever taxes become extremely heavy. Well, sir, there is but one buyer, there can be but one buyer; that buyer will be the New York Central railroad; and of course, after buying the Erie canal they will get control of this corporation around Niagara falls, for that would be a very simple process; and when they get the entire control and make a monopoly of the carrying trade, I think it will be the darkest day for the agricultural products of the West that they have ever yet seen.

The Senator from Ohio said this morning they burnt their corn for fuel. Let this monopoly once be created, and the Erie canal will be made to pay $100,000,000; and they will not only be compelled to burn their corn in the West but they will also burn their wheat. They will be looking around very soon for a new channel. It has taken from thirty to forty years to secure this channel; and how long will it take to secure another?

Sir, the interests of the West and the interests of the East are identical; there should be no rivalry; there should be no rival route. What should be done would be to enlarge the locks of the Erie canal, and that measure will be done by the State of New York. I feel confident that the locks upon the Erie canal will be enlarged; measures will be taken during the next winter; and those locks can be enlarged in a single year so that boats of from five hundred and fifty to six hundred tons can be taken through. I hope, therefore, the motion to postpone will prevail.

Mr. SHERMAN. When this subject was up the other day, I think I indicated a purpose to move to postpone the bill, but I withdrew it at the suggestion of other Senators. Further reflection has convinced me, although the necessities of my immediate constituents are very much in favor of the construction of this ship-canal, yet that we ought not at the present session of Congress undertake by this bill to commence the construction of that work. The State of New York, as the Senator from New York has properly said, is now in possession of a work that has always been liberally managed to the West. As long as that work is controlled by the State of New York there is no doubt that the tolls will be put as low as they can be consistent with the proper repair of the work and a small income from it. No complaint has ever been made of unreasonable or improper tolls on that canal, but the canal itself is not sufficient to transport vessels of proper size, schooners and the like, from the waters of the lakes to the waters of the Hudson, and therefore sooner or later some mode of transit around Niagara falls will be constructed. But the question with me is whether we should commence the construction of that work by giving to a corporation of citizens, over whom we shall have no control, over whose tolls we shall have no control, who will only be controlled by their own interests, a monopoly of this work. I am inclined to think that if this work is ever done by a corporation, they will levy such a tribute upon the transportation of the West as to make it oppressive, and we shall all regret that we had any agency in this transaction.

Mr. TRUMBULL. The Senator has not examined the bill, surely. We have control over the tolls by the bill.

Mr. SHERMAN. Then the bill has been altered from what it was originally. I have not noticed the amendments that have been made.

Mr. TRUMBULL. The twenty-seventh section authorizes Congress at any time to alter, amend, or repeal the act; and then we provide for a board to meet every five years to revise the tolls.

Mr. SHERMAN. The authority to amend or repeal the act does not amount to anything.

Mr. TRUMBULL. We provide in section twenty-three for a board of commissioners to meet every five years to revise the tolls.

Mr. SHERMAN. I know that for a considerable period of time there is no limit on the tolls, and then a revision is to be made by five commissioners, one to be appointed by the President, one by the Governor of New York, one by the Governor of Massachusetts, one by the Governor of Illinois, and one by the canal company. I look upon a tribunal of that kind to revise tolls as of very little account. At any rate it is not the proper way to place it under the control of five men, one interested, being appointed by the company, another appointed by the President of the United States, and three appointed by the Governors of New York, Massachusetts, and Illinois. Why confine the appointments to those particular States? The State of Ohio will have much more interest in this canal when built than any other State. In New York it will be a rival to works held by the State itself. The State of Massachusetts has no interest in it whatever that I know of. The produce going through this canal will either go on to the sea through the St. Lawrence, or will go through the Oswego canal on its way to New York, so that I cannot see why Massachusetts is designated as one of the States which is to have the appointment of a commissioner.

At any rate this mode of regulating tolls is a very insufficient one, and I think that when this work is done it ought to be done by the Government of the United States. In the mean time we have the benefit of the Welland canal and we have the benefit of the Erie canal. We have those two modes of transit now. It will be a long time before this work is completed under the management of a company, and we are to undertake to guaranty their bonds to the amount of $6,000,000. The water privileges conferred by this improvement will be immensely valuable. They ought to be controlled by the Government when constructed. This is the great navigable stream, the great boundary between the Canadas and the United States. It will be a work of great cost and of great importance, and it ought to be under the control of the Government.

It seems to me that under these circumstances we ought not to embark in an operation that will involve us in the ultimate payment of $6,000,000 and the interest that may accumulate upon that sum, because no Senator here, I imagine, supposes that this canal company will ever pay back the money. That has not been the usual custom in dealing with Government in such matters. With a single exception no money ever spent by the United States in a work of internal improvement has been refunded. It is very common to put in the bills a provision for refunding the money, but it has never been actually done except in the case of the Louisville and Portland canal. That is the only exception, and there the mere principal was refunded after a long while, and then the tolls were applied to buy out all the private interests. It was found necessary and indispensable in that case to buy out all the private interests and vest the whole property substantially in the United States. That work, which was built by the Louisville and Portland Canal Company, the United States owning one half of the stock and individuals owning the other half, was conducted with great success, and finally the Government of the United States received back the principal of its money, and then it became necessary to reduce the tolls. The interests of private individuals, however, would not yield to a proper reduction of the tolls, and the result was that by the consent of Kentucky and the United States a law was passed which authorized the United States, substantially, to buy out the interests of the private stockholders. That has been done, and now the whole property is owned by the United States, and no tolls are received except enough to keep the canal in repair and to enlarge it. That is always the result of the dealing of the Government with a public improvement, and it ought to be the result.

It seems to me that if we place this franchise and the construction of this work within the power of any corporation, we shall either be compelled to buy out that corporation, as we did in the case of the Louisville and Portland canal, or we shall have constant complaints about the tolls, constant struggles for their decrease; and if the danger with which the Senator from New York threatens us should occur, then we certainly should be in a very bad predicament. A single corporation would control both charters, because if the New York Central railroad should ever buy out the Erie canal they would undoubtedly buy out this competing line, and the result would be that one huge monopoly would control this whole business.

Under the circumstances I feel disposed to postpone the bill, especially as one section of it which is still retained, and without which this bill could not have passed the House, provides that no action can be taken under it until after the meeting of the Legislature of New York and its assent shall have been given. I have it from members of the House who are in favor of the bill that it could not have passed the House and could not have had the sanction of the committee that reported it without that section.

Mr. TRUMBULL. That section was reported in the Senate by our committee.

Mr. SHERMAN. I beg pardon; I meant to say that the bill could not have been reported to the Senate by our committee without that section.

Mr. HOWARD. The bill passed the House without that clause by a large majority.

Mr. SHERMAN. I understand from a member of our committee that the bill could not have been reported to the Senate without that section in it.

Mr. HOWARD. I do not know how that may be, but the statement of the honorable Senator was that this bill could not have passed the House of Representatives without that clause being in. I refer him to the fact that it did pass without it.

Mr. SHERMAN. I withdraw that part of my statement. I simply meant to say that I was informed by a member of the Senate committee that this bill would not have been reported to the Senate by the committee except with that clause in it. Now, if we strike it out, it is really a bill that has passed without the sanction of the committee which reported it. No harm can result from postponing the bill until next December. No proceedings can be had under it in the mean time. Although my State, probably, as I said before, is more interested than any other in the construction of a canal to avoid this great natural obstruction and secure free navigation to the sea through the St. Lawrence, I am yet disposed to vote for the postponement of the bill at the present session.

Mr. HOWARD. Mr. President, I cannot but notice that those gentlemen who are in favor of postponing the bill until next December proclaim in the same breath their opposition to it. I shall not, therefore, expect their votes in favor of the bill even next December. So far as they are concerned, the bill has no favor to expect.

I hope, sir, the bill will not be postponed. I think it a measure of so much importance as to challenge the continual attention of Congress until it is passed, and I venture to say that the apprehensions which seem to be entertained by the honorable Senator from New York, that the establishment of such a work as this will render the Erie canal and the New York Central railroad valueless, are entirely imaginary.

Mr. MORGAN. I did not say that.

Mr. HOWARD. I understood the honorable Senator to say that one effect of this work would be to render the Erie canal valueless.

Mr. MORGAN. I stated that if this canal were built, and should prove a success, it would so divert trade from the Erie canal as to cause large taxation, and cause the people of the State of New York to demand an amendment of the constitution and a sale of that canal. I said that in that event there could be but one buyer; there could be no purchaser except the New York Central railroad corporation, for a very large amount of money would be required, and that corporation, while it might buy the canal for fifteen or twenty million dollars, would, after it once had perfect control, get an income on a capital of perhaps a hundred million dollars, and make it extremely valuable instead of valueless; but they would, at the same time, inflict very severe injury upon the agricultural products of the West. That was the point which I raised.

Mr. HOWARD. I did not entirely misapprehend the honorable Senator. The point of his objection is that if this work shall be established by Congress, and shall become a success, in his phrase, it will in some way increase taxation in the State of New York to such a degree that the people will clamor for a sale of the Erie canal. Is that a logical consequence? Is it possible to conceive how it is that the success of the Niagara ship-canal will increase taxation in the State of New York so as to make it necessary that that State should sell it?

Mr. MORGAN. I can answer the Senator.

Mr. HOWARD. Very possibly the Senator can answer; but as at present informed, I am unable to perceive the sequence which seems to connect these two events in his mind. I cannot understand how the establishment of a canal round the falls of Niagara and the success of that work can have the effect to increase the taxation of the State of New York; I mean the State taxation. I suppose that is what the honorable Senator means:

Mr. MORGAN. Will the Senator yield to me for a moment?

Mr. HOWARD. Certainly, I will yield for an explanation.

Mr. MORGAN. By the constitution of the State of New York a certain amount in every year is placed to the credit of the sinking fund to provide for the interest and the redemption of a portion of the principal debt. During the present year the State has been compelled to tax the people $1,500,000 to support the canals and to make good the constitutional requirement of the sinking fund. If this canal should be built and divert the trade still further, it might make that tax, instead of $1,500,000, $3,000,000; and it would if it were a success. It would depend altogether upon that.

Mr. HOWARD. After all, Mr. President, the Senator will pardon me for saying his remarks show that he entertains the apprehension that the success of the Niagara ship-canal will have the effect to reduce the revenues of the New York canal to such a degree as to make it necessary to impose additional taxation upon the people in order to fill the treasury of the State. That is to say, it will have a tendency to reduce in some degree, and according to him, in a very great degree, the revenues which the State of New York now derives from the tolls upon her canal. That is all there is about it, as I understand.

Now, Mr. President, I shall not undertake to detain the Senate with a detailed statement of the insufficiency of the means of transportation through the State of New York for western products at the present time. The whole commercial world understands this perfectly well now. The West are paying very large tribute to the State of New York on the transportation of their goods and passengers passing upon the canal as well as upon the Central railroad, which, I suppose, also pays a specific tax into State treasury. Does it not?

Mr. MORGAN. It does not.

Mr. HOWARD. I was under a misapprehension, then, as to that. In proof of this I beg to call the attention of Senators to the fact that during the last summer there was a commercial convention held at the city where I reside, Detroit, who among other subjects, took into consideration the necessity of constructing a ship-canal around the falls of Niagara. I know that a vast majority of that convention voted in favor of this great enterprise. I will not undertake to say that the convention were unanimous upon the question, but the majority was so great as to approach very nearly to unanimity. And I undertake to say further, what the honorable Senator from New York will not deny, that that convention was composed of the most intelligent, the most enterprising men throughout the United States, as well as various gentlemen who did them the honor to come from the British Provinces and participate in their deliberations.

In the minds of that convention there was no doubt or hesitation about the necessity of this great work as an additional avenue for the outlet of western and northwestern productions to the eastern markets. That fact is, of itself, in my mind, quite sufficient to justify the interest which I feel, and which other western men feel, in the construction of this work. And I apprehend, sir, it will turn out in the end that, however great and striking may be the success of the Niagara ship-canal, that success will not rest with the weight of a pepper-corn upon the revenues of the State of New York arising from the Erie canal. The canal and the railroads of that State, and all other facilities she can afford for the outlet of western products, will be filled to their utmost capacity in relieving the West of its surplus productions.

Sir, I would say not one word by way of disparaging the great and generous State of New York. It is to the policy of that glorious State, inaugurated under the immortal Clinton, that the Northwest is to-day indebted for a vast share of the prosperity, wealth, and power she enjoys. The Erie canal had the magic effect to create a commercial empire in the West, and it has grown with most marvelous rapidity from the day that canal reached to Buffalo until the present. Its growth has never been checked, but has been constantly in progress, and it is destined to go on from year to year and from century to century with this continued, almost miraculous growth, until we, or rather our posterity, will see the ripe fruits of De Witt Clinton's great conception of a canal connecting the waters of the Atlantic with those of the Lakes.

I will not occupy the time of the Senate longer except to say, in reply to some observations that fell from the Senator from Ohio, that I most earnestly object to the establishment of this work as a Government work. I do not believe the Government is well fitted either to construct or to carry on such a work, and it is my firm conviction that we shall pay out double, treble, perhaps even quadruple, the amount of money in the construction if we undertake to do it simply as a Government work, than will be required if the same work shall be done by a private corporation. By erecting a private corporation for the purpose we appeal to private interest; we invoke the vigilance of private interest to keep guard over this work, and to prevent unnecessary waste and unnecessary expenditure.

As to another observation which fell from the honorable Senator from New York, that it is not competent for Congress to erect a private corporation in the State of New York for this purpose, I can only say that I entertain an entirely different opinion. Nor do I understand that there has been any decision or any announcement of principles by the great and wise men to whom he referred which goes to establish the doctrine that the United States can create no corporation for commercial purposes within the limits of a State. It will be found that our legislation itself contains many contradictions of that asserted principle of constitutional law. I have no doubt of the power of Congress to erect a corporation for just such a purpose; nor do I doubt that if the question shall ever be brought fairly before the Supreme Court of the United States, that tribunal will hold that we are invested with full power under the Constitution to establish it. Indeed, sir, if the twenty-eighth section shall be retained in the bill, so deep is my conviction of the unconstitutionality of it that I shall, I fear, be constrained to vote against it, for being satisfied that Congress is vested with adequate power to create this corporation in the State of New York, I feel reluctant to consent that our legislation shall depend upon the will of the State of New York, or upon the consent of any other body on the face of the earth.

Mr. President, I hope the bill, without that section, will be passed, and not be postponed. I ask Senators, especially from the West, to pay a proper regard to what they must see are the interests of their own constituents, and to the opinions which have been so often expressed by our wisest and best commercial men. I ask them to have a proper regard to the interests of western agriculture, commerce, and trade, and, if possible, to relieve us, so far as practicable, from the heavy burdens our productions are subjected to in their transit to eastern markets.

Mr. SHERMAN. There is one observation that I neglected to make when I was up, that I had intended to make; and that is that at this session we have appropriated between one and two million dollars for the improvement of the lake defenses and the rivers which form this line of communication. We have already done at this session more than has been done for a number of years. What has been most desired by our constituents is what will give them immediate relief. We have appropriated sufficient to put all the harbors of the upper lakes that are now in use in a good state of repair. It seems to me at this time, when we have undertaken so much of an extraordinary character, so much more than is usually done, that we ought not now, in addition, to embark in this large expenditure. For the improvement of every harbor for the improvement of which an estimate had been made from Chicago through the whole series of the lakes and down to the St. Lawrence, within our territory, there has been ample provision made. Having already attended to the immediate wants of our constituents on the northern border, we ought not in reason to involve the Government in so large a contract as this will be. There is no limitation on the amount. This guarantee is only so many millions, but we know very well from the history of other appropriations of a similar character that if this amount is not sufficient more will be called for, and more will be given; and we have no estimate of the cost. We have no estimate made by any United States engineer as to the amount that will be necessary to complete this work. There is no sufficient guarantee for its completion. I think, therefore, until we get fuller information, until we know what the cost of this work will be, where it is proposed to be located precisely, and the mode and manner of the construction of the work, we ought not to make this contract.

Mr. GRIMES. Mr. President, being one of the Senators from the West to whom the Senator from Michigan has made his appeal to properly protect and represent the interests of their constituents, and differing from him slightly as to what my duty is in this regard, I wish simply to say that I think I shall be representing their true interests when, with the Senator from Ohio, also a western Senator, I shall vote for the motion of the Senator from New York to postpone this bill.

Every person who is familiar with the legislative history of Congress must be struck with the wide departures that are now being constantly made from the former practice in regard to questions of this kind. Until within the last two or three years, I think, no great work of this description was ever undertaken without a regular survey having first been made and a report predicated upon that survey by Government officials in the employ and under the direction of the Government. Why, sir, if my recollection serves me aright, we spent more than a million dollars in making what were deemed to be necessary surveys of the Pacific railroad. I think that the Government did not embark in the construction of even the "national road," so called, a common highway, until after surveys had been made of it; and the surveys always progressed as the work proceeded far in advance of the construction of the road. Now we are asked, without any survey, so far as I know, certainly without any survey authorized by Congress, without any survey made by anybody under our official sanction, to pass a bill for a vast internal improvement which, if I do not misunderstand it, appropriates $6,000,000, and according to the statement of the Senator from Ohio, may require untold millions to complete it. I wish it to be understood, and I think I stated to the Senate before, that no man is more anxious to have channels of communication between the West and the East than I am, although I confess that I am not so anxious to have them as some gentlemen seem to be for the purpose merely of making the West an agricultural country, for the purpose of continuing us merely as an agricultural population, as the producers of heavy articles for export. I may be mistaken about it, but I think I am representing the interests of that section when I decline to vote for this bill to-day.

The tendency of all corporations now seems to be to consolidation. I would ask the Senator from Wisconsin to look to the railroads in his State, how they have been consolidated within the last two or three years, so that they have almost acquired a monopoly of all the transportation in the State of Wisconsin. I do not know that it is possible for a citizen of Minnesota to get his produce to Chicago from St. Paul by any of the lines of railroad without paying tribute to that immense monopoly, the Northwestern railroad; and I understand from the newspapers that it is attempting to engross the trade further south, and is negotiating in order to secure even the Rock Island road, in the State of Illinois. It already controls the traffic that passes over two lines of road in the State of Iowa, and is attempting to engross another.

Now, I have the fears which the Senator from New York has expressed, that if we pass this bill for the benefit of a company the time is not far distant when the company to whom you grant this subsidy will sell out its franchise to the parties that own the lines of transportation across the State of New York. Why, sir, I am credibly informed that the New York Central railroad, the Harlem railroad, and the Hudson River railroad are now run and controlled in the same interest. They have been attempting to secure the Erie canal. Whenever you construct this ship-canal so as to make the support of the Erie canal a burden upon the people of New York; if it shall be in some future years as it has been, I understand, in the last year, when they were compelled to tax the people of the State of New York $2,000,000 in order to keep up the Erie canal, how long do you suppose it will be before there will be a public sentiment in the State of New York that will compel the Legislature of that State to put its canal up in the market for sale, just as Pennsylvania put up her canal? Not long. What will be the result? The result will be that this immense monopoly that now owns the New York Central, the Hudson River, and the Harlem roads will get possession of the Erie canal. Then how are you going to be benefited? The Senators who advocate this bill say that they will have an outlet into Lake Ontario through this proposed Niagara canal construction; but that leaves you with no means of getting any further unless you are tributary to the monopoly by going through the Oswego canal to the Erie canal. You are still tributary to this great monopoly.

Mr. SHERMAN. Allow me to state to the Senator if they attempt to go down the St. Lawrence they have to go through Canada and pass through the Lachine locks.

Mr. GRIMES. The Senator has well said that when we get into Lake Ontario we have the choice of going two ways; we can go through Canada, through the Lachine locks, or whatever they are called, down to Montreal and pay tribute to Canada; or we can take the New York canal at Oswego, go down to Rome and then continue on the main line of the Erie canal to Troy or Albany, paying tribute to this grand monopoly that engrosses the New York Central road and the Erie canal; and after they have accomplished that, when they shall find that it will be their interest to do it, then they will put their hands upon this franchise that you give to this company, and then where are the people of my country? In the hands of a soulless monopoly.

The Senator from Michigan says he never will consent to the Government of the United States undertaking this work as a national work. I never will consent to the Government of the United States making it in any other light than as a national work. I am not disposed to let a company occupy the only unoccupied ground for a transit route that there is between the Mississippi river and the Atlantic ocean, and then set all the people that are west of it at defiance and charge just such tolls as they choose.

I suppose that this bill has provisions, but I think they were stricken out to-day, limiting the tolls. There is probably a provision, or will be, in the bill, authorizing Congress to legislate on that subject. I would not give the snap of my finger for any such provision as that in any bill. Congress will not legislate about it. They never will change it. If it has not got the power now, they will give the power to the company to transfer its franchise to any other company. That will be the result of it.

Mr. HOWE. It cannot be done.

Mr. GRIMES. It cannot be done, the Senator says. It can be done. They are not authorized to do it by the terms of the charter, but they can buy up the stock of the company; they will run it, not in the name of the New York Central railroad or of the New York and Erie canal, but they will conduct it in the name of the present company that you authorize, they deriving all the benefit from it and controlling it. That is the way in which they can do it, by buying up all the stock, putting in their own creatures or their own friends as directors and controllers of it. Now, sir, for these reasons I am disposed to postpone this measure until the day specified by the Senator from New York; or if the committee in charge of the bill will introduce a measure authorizing the engineer department to make a survey, and that survey shall be reported upon favorably, I am ready to vote this minute for an appropriation of six millions, if you please, to aid in the construction of the work; and if that is not enough I will vote for whatever may be necessary.

The Senator from Michigan says that it will cost the Government a great deal more if the Government undertakes to build it than if this company undertakes to build it. Very likely it may; I presume the Senator is correct in that regard; but we can afford to pay a great deal more. When we have made it we are not to be oppressed with tolls in the future; we shall have the control of that subject. All that it will be necessary for us to do will be to keep it in repair and furnish the gate-keepers and the agents. They can be paid through a small toll to be levied, or they can be paid directly from the Treasury of the United States; but under the provisions of this bill, it seems to me we shall subject ourselves to the imposition of just such tolls as this company may see fit to impose.

Mr. FESSENDEN. I shall vote for this postponement, and I am free to say that if it is not postponed in the present attitude of the bill, I shall vote against the bill itself, although I stand precisely in the category referred to by the honorable Senator from Michigan—not that I should inevitably be opposed to constructing this canal. At a proper time and under proper circumstances I am inclined to think that I might favor it. That is my present impression in relation to the matter, although I have not examined the subject sufficiently to be prepared to give a definite answer on that point; but there is nothing in my mind in reference to it that would necessarily prevent my doing so, and I am favorable to the object.

My difficulty is of another description. I did not vote for the Pacific railroad bill. I did not vote at all on that measure. I believe there were only five votes against it. If my vote would have defeated the bill as it stood, I probably should have voted against it, not that I was opposed to the construction of the Pacific railroad, but I have been from the beginning opposed, even for the purpose of obtaining a very considerable good, to violating what I supposed to be a constitutional provision, or at any rate of transcending the limits of the power which we had under the Constitution. My view with regard to the Pacific railroad was that we could only construct it under what is called the war power, connecting the country together for the common defense. I supposed to that end that it was not necessary for us to go any further than to construct the road through the Territories of the United States, from State to State; and the mode in which I thought it ought to be done was that it should be properly surveyed. We had already had general surveys; but as it was a national work, the propriety of the thing required that the national Government should ascertain where the road ought to be built, lay it out, decide upon the line, fix it, and then build it for national purposes. I have been opposed always to putting national works into the power of corporations; and since the vote was taken on that subject my objection has been growing stronger and stronger every day, for it is getting to be the case under the legislation of Congress, in my judgment, that the country is to be controlled by great corporations and our legislation is to be controlled by them, so that we are no longer really to have any power left in relation to such subjects.

Now, sir, look at this proposition. It is put on two grounds by some gentlemen. I believe my friend from Massachusetts [Mr. SUMNER] puts it on the commercial power. Well, sir, I am in some degree a strict, perhaps it may be said a narrow, constructionist; but, as has been observed before, it is only very recently that it has been found out that under the power to "regulate commerce" the Government had the power to make a communication through States; that is to say, to make a channel of commerce where none before existed, either in the way of railroads or canals, or anything of that description. It is a very modern doctrine. It used to be held, especially by the Democracy, very strongly and very thoroughly, (and I fell into their views upon that subject,) that in relation to commerce, where we found that it existed by nature, where there were channels of commerce made for us, we had the power to improve them under the power to regulate; but the idea that we could make new channels in the shape of railroads or canals, or anything of that sort, for the sake of increasing the commercial convenience of the country was a doctrine that, if carried out, led to a most unlimited expenditure of money, and was assuming, under a power to regulate, the power to create, which did not, in my judgment, exist. Perhaps I may be wrong upon this subject; but I mention it simply to show to my friend from Massachusetts that the question is not so clear to me as in his remarks the other day he supposed it ought to be to everybody, so that there could not be any dispute about it. It has failed to approve itself to my mind. I stand as yet by the old landmarks. I do not know but that I may be convinced by and by; but at present I am not convinced that they ought to be removed.

Then comes the question of the war power, whether we can do it under the provision giving power to Congress to provide for the general defense. I think we can, and I think we are the proper tribunal to decide on that subject. But I have yet to be convinced that, under the power to provide for the general defense, we may construct a public work and then pass that work over into the hands of a corporation and cease to own and control it. If a public work is necessary for the general defense of the country, that work must necessarily, when made, belong to the country, and be under the control of the country. This idea of constructing important public works, which ought not to be constructed at all unless they are important to the defense of the country in the first place, and which may be of the last importance in case of war, and then parting with the power over those works, either in peace or war or at any time, has always struck me as very curious.

Entertaining those ideas, I come to the same conclusion in reference to this work that I did with reference to the Pacific railroad, that if constructed at all it should only be after a careful examination by the Government of the United States; that it should be a Government work; that it should remain under the control of the Government; else it has not the character and cannot be subject to the necessity upon which it is supposed to be founded. Those are the ideas, in short—I have neither strength nor inclination to make a speech on the matter—upon which I have proceeded hitherto and to which I have adhered; and believing that the doctrines are sound I cannot vote for this bill which proposes to put into the hands of a corporation the power to make a public work to suit itself, on its own surveys, without reference to any judgment by the Government of the United States upon the character of the work itself in reality, and to be left in their hands with power to go into a single State, making no communication from one State to another, and make a new channel of commerce for commercial purposes or to undertake to construct a work for the general defense which when constructed will not be a work of the Government itself, belong to it, appertain to it, be under its control, or subject to its authority.

For these reasons I shall vote to postpone this bill, in the hope that at another session the friends of the measure may bring in a bill which I can vote for, which is not subject to the objections I have stated; but if this bill is not postponed, but is pressed at the present session, I shall, for the reasons I have given, feel under the necessity of voting against it.

Mr. WILSON. I do not suppose this vote is to be taken to-night, and I should like to have unanimous consent to take up a little bill that I suppose everybody is for, or ought to be for—a bill to revive the grade of general in the Army. I am very anxious to get that bill up.

Mr. FESSENDEN. That is in the Army bill you passed.

Mr. HOWE. I do not understand the Senator from Massachusetts to submit a motion.

Mr. WILSON. I do not submit a motion. I only ask to take it up by unanimous consent.

Mr. JOHNSON. Is not that provided for in the Army bill?

Mr. WILSON. No.

Mr. FESSENDEN. The creation of a general is.

Mr. HOWE. I am in hopes that we can obtain a vote on this bill to-night, and sustained by that hope I will not make a long speech. I desire to submit two or three remarks, perhaps half a dozen of them, in reply to what has been urged in support of this motion to postpone the consideration of the bill until the next session.

The first remark I have to make is that every reason which has been urged for the postponement of the bill is a reason more or less cogent against the passage of the bill, but, as I understand, is no reason why we should not vote upon the passage of the bill at this session just as well as at the next. I do not hear any reason offered by any one why we shall be better prepared to vote upon this bill at the next than we are at the present session. The Senator from Maine says that if we can get a good bill we shall be prepared to vote on it. Mr. President, if you postpone this bill until December you will have this bill then before you, no better and no worse than it is now, and you will be guided by the same considerations in voting yea or nay upon the passage of this bill in December as you are in July.

This general remark brings me to consider for a moment whether this is a proper bill to be passed or not. It is urged by several Senators that this proposition has been preceded by no survey of the work on the part of the Government. That is true; and the answer to that and the reason for that is that the Government does not propose to build the canal.

Mr. FESSENDEN. They would if you passed a bill directing them to have a survey made.

Mr. HOWE. If we had a bill here directing a survey to be made by the engineers of the Government and providing for appropriations out of the national Treasury to complete the work when the surveys had been made, then, it is true, we should have such a proposition, and upon that we could vote; but unless the Government proposes to build the canal there is no reason why the Government should survey the line of it or estimate its expense. The simple question for us to consider is, is it a work of national importance, of sufficient importance to the nation to warrant us, not in giving money to its construction, but in loaning money to those who shall undertake its construction?

Upon this question, whether it is a work of national importance or not, I shall not spend a moment's time, for the plain reason that nobody denies it. Everybody here admits that it is a work of the very first importance to the whole country. If it is a work of that importance, then it is to be executed. If it is to be executed somebody should do it. If anybody is to do it, it must be done by the Government or by private individuals either associated into a company or not. Senators may say it should be done by the Government. The first answer I have to make to that suggestion is, that the Government has stood here nearly one hundred years and has not attempted it; and I think I am authorized to say that unless by some such measure as this it be attempted the Government will stand here two hundred years longer and will not attempt it. If, then, you will rely on the Government to execute this enterprise by appropriations out of the national Treasury, it is to be postponed, not till next December, but until a million of Decembers have passed us by.

But why should the Government execute this work by appropriations out of its own Treasury? The Senator from Maine says that it may have control of the work when it is done. The Senator from Iowa says that it may have control over the tolls upon the work. Why, sir, when the Government has executed this work by appropriations out of its own Treasury its tolls will be subject only to the control of Congress, and the use of the canal will be subject only to the control of Congress. Sir, whoever reads the bill as it lies on his desk will see that that same control is given in both respects over this canal when it is built by a private company. Regarded as a measure of national defense the Senator from Maine urges that we ought not to pass the control over to a company. Why? What does the nation want of it as a measure of defense but to pass its gunboats, its troops, its property to and fro upon it? Under the provisions of this bill that can be done by the sanctions of law and without paying a dollar's tribute. You have just as complete, just as absolute control over this work for the purposes of national defense when built by a company under this bill as you could have if you built it yourselves and out of your own Treasury.

The Senator from Iowa says it will be built more cheaply by a company than by the Government. I hold him to the admission. I say, then, by so much as it will be built cheaper by a company than by the Government, by so much is the country benefited in the mere matter of economy.

Mr. GRIMES. My admission is that it is possible, probable, indeed, that it will cost more to the Government; but I want free communication. The Senator from Wisconsin wants every one to pay tolls that passes through.

Mr. HOWE. I am not ambitious that anything should pay tolls unnecessarily. The Senator from Iowa wants that it should be free communication. Does he stand by that?

Mr. GRIMES. Yes.

Mr. HOWE. Then I will stand with him. I hold him to his admission that it can be built more cheaply and will be built more cheaply by the company. This bill authorizes you, whenever you see fit, to take it of the company and pay it the reduced cost which he admits it will be subjected to, with the simple addition of ten per cent. thereon. The company will build it cheaper than the Government, and when the company has built it at that reduced cost, if the Senator is still hungering and thirsting after making it a free communication, he has simply to vote with me and the other friends of this measure to purchase it of these cheap constructors, and we have it, and we have free communication.

Mr. President, the Senator from New York reminds us as a reason, he says, not why we should not build the canal, but why we should postpone the passage of this bill until December, that we are overborne by taxation; we are burdened with a great debt. Does the Senator imagine that our debt is particularly larger now in July than it will be in December? Will that argument be any less weighty against the consideration of the bill in December than it is now in July? But what has that suggestion to do with the question at all, either now or in December next? Sir, if this measure is not one, as I said the other day, to strengthen the people of the United States, to make them more wealthy, more independent, more able to stand up under this burden, then we have no business to pass this bill in July, nor shall we have any business to pass it in December. You all concede, when you concede its importance, that it will make the people stronger. If it will not, it is not important. Well, sir, if it will make them stronger, for God's sake do they not need it more now when they are weaker than they ever were in the world? If you ever mean to nurse and nourish by Government appropriations the people, do they not need it now when they stand confronted by this great debt and are groaning under it? It is as a measure of relief that I ask you to embrace this, of popular relief, and I ask you to embrace it now, not postpone it to another day.

The Senator from New York urges that this is a measure antagonistic to that State. If it is antagonistic to the State of New York, how will this antagonism be got over between this and December? Will it be less antagonistic then than now? That may be a reason why we should not pass the bill at all. I submit to the honorable Senator that it is not, and that it cannot be a reason why we should postpone its consideration to another session of this body. But is it a reason why we should not pass the bill? How is it to come in antagonism with the State of New York? I do not concede the fact that it is so. It may be antagonistic to the interests of the Erie canal; but I understand that the wealth of New York lies in the fact that it has the great commercial metropolis of the nation within its boundaries, and that through its gateway the bulk of whatever comes into or goes out of the country must pass, and that it is to-day and it must be but a thoroughfare through which the commerce of the nation shall pass to and fro between the sea-board and the interior. Whatever enriches the nation, therefore, does and must of necessity enrich the State of New York. Why, sir, the growth of the West, consequent upon the construction of the Erie canal, is to-day what makes New York what she is. The Senator from Michigan remarked that the Northwest was indebted to the Erie canal for being what she is. I should not have expressed myself exactly in the same way; I should have said that the nation was indebted to the Erie canal for the existence of the Northwest. But for the Erie canal you would have had no Northwest, or none to speak of.

Mr. MORGAN. That is true.

Mr. HOWE. That is true, says my friend from New York. We are agreed upon one point, then. Now, I have to say to my friend, if he likes the style of the goods, why not increase the production? Enlarge the facilities for communicating between the Northwest and the sea-board, and you will get more of the same style of goods. The Northwest has but begun to develop, but you cannot stand a much larger development; you have not the facilities. Commerce groans on its way between the interior and the sea-board now. You must enlarge the facilities or we shall cease to grow, and so will you, for when we cease to grow you must. You depend upon us as much as we do upon you. The dependence is mutual. There can be no sectional interest here.

But it may be said that this measure is antagonistic to the Erie canal, and that we ought to be grateful to the Erie canal for what it has done. So we are grateful to the Erie canal for what it has done. Our gratitude is manifested, if you call it gratitude. The account is not against us. We paid you for the Erie canal, and we paid you a large sum beside. We have paid more than nine million dollars. The tolls levied upon this commerce which we are trying to provide for have paid for the Erie canal, and more than nine millions beside. It has therefore cost you nothing, but you are the gainers by nine millions of money through the construction of that simple work.

Now, Mr. President, ought not New York to be willing to square accounts with us? We do not ask her to pay back that $9,000,000, but ought she not to be willing to settle, to jump the accounts, that being the way the thing stands? I conceive so. Ought she to insist that this already great country, in the basin of the lakes and in the valley of the Mississippi, already grown great, and which wants to grow greater, shall make its commerce trickle through that little one-horse canal? No, sir; we want a two-horse canal at once to do the business; a larger one as soon as we can get it. Steam must be employed not merely around the falls of Niagara; not merely between Lake Erie and Lake Ontario; steam must be employed to do that work the whole distance to the sea-board; and sooner or later it will be. This is one of the steps.

But the Senator from New York rather undertakes to frighten us from the prosecution of this design by holding up to us the prospect that the Erie canal, finding itself depreciated in usefulness by the construction of this work, will get impatient and discouraged and insist upon being sold, and that the people of New York will demand to have it sold. Well, Mr. President, when the Erie canal becomes useless by the construction of a larger, a more capable, a more generous rival, I shall not have any particular objection to its being sold, and I shall have no particular objection to the New York Central Railroad Company buying it. But I am extremely inclined to think that when that day comes it will be about the last piece of property that the New York Central Railroad Company would care to invest in. The New York Central Railroad Company will never want the Erie canal unless it can do business, and the Erie canal never can do business when there are larger and more capable rivals by its side; so that I am not specially terrified by that consideration.

But, says the Senator from Ohio, why will you agree to the construction of the work provided for in this bill, and abandon all control over the tolls, and allow an incorporated company to put such tolls upon the canal as they see fit to levy? Why, sir, we do not propose any such thing. There is every variety of control given to us that could be thought of. First we provide that once in five years a board of commissioners, one to be appointed by the President, one by the Governor of each of several States which are named, and one by the company, shall meet together for the purpose of revising the tolls; and secondly, we provide that at any time the Congress of the United States may regulate the tolls just as they please, put them high or put them low; and thirdly, we provide that if we are dissatisfied with both these measure of control we may purchase the property, pay for it, and make the canal free. Do you want any more absolute control than that? Can you have it? Build it yourselves and you will not have any more control. Then Congress can put the tolls just as they please, and now they can put them just as they please.

But, says the Senator from Ohio, we have been already making liberal appropriations; this year we have appropriated from one to two million dollars for the improvement of harbors and the creation of defenses. That is a good thing to do. That makes the country just so much more wealthy; but is that any reason? Because you have a coat, Mr. President, is it any reason that you should not seek for a pair of pantaloons? Because you have harbors by which you can get into the ports on Lake Michigan and Lake Superior, is it any reason why you should not have a channel by which you can get to those harbors? Your harbors are in a measure useless without these added channels of communication. Why do you want to provide for commerce to go into your harbors unless you will provide the ways for commerce to get to them?

But it is said it is a monopoly. What is a monopoly? This company; a company under the absolute control of the national Legislature, besides all these other controls! I repeat that the moment it begins to be a monopoly or act like a monopoly you have only to do what the Senator from Maine and the Senator from Iowa say they want to do, to wit, just launch the money out of the Treasury and buy it.

Mr. President, I am not going to detain the Senate. I could deluge the body with figures enforcing the necessity of this work; but I shall not do it. If figures were as cooling and refreshing as water, such a day would be the day to do it, perhaps. They are not, and I shall not occupy the time. I only ask gentlemen to be logical; I only ask gentlemen to act consistently with their own admission, with their own confession. They admit the necessity of the work; then let us build it. That is all there is of it. The committee thought it more prudent and more economical to employ a company.

I do not mean to go into the constitutional question. The Senator from Maine has raised it. I think the Supreme Court has decided, and I believe the country has acquiesced in it, that whatever the Government may do directly by itself, either in the prosecution of commerce or of national defense or in any other way, it may do by the creation of a company. I believe that that is the established law of the land to-day; but that there is any constitutional objection to this, I am not prepared to admit, nor am I prepared to take the time to argue against the assertion of it.

If it is supposed that the State of New York ought to be consulted, that her assent ought to be required; upon that we have not definitely determined; that is not involved in this question of postponement. That we can consider as well this year as next; that is a question to be considered when that amendment shall be under consideration in the Senate. Although I voted for that amendment in committee, I have no more belief that we are under obligations to ask the permission of one State when the commerce of the United States shall pass through it, or how it shall pass through, than I feel obliged to ask my consent when it can pass by my house.

Sir, it seems to me if we are dealing honestly with this great interest we shall consider to-day or at this session whether it is one which the people demand or not. If we say it is one which the people do not demand, we shall vote against it. If we conclude (which every Senator here concedes) it is one which the people do demand, we should commence to build it to-day. This company is required to exhibit its faith by its works before the United States is called upon to contribute a dollar; it is never called upon to contribute a dollar; but before you are asked to loan a dollar, this company must contribute to the stock, pay in, and expend in the construction of the canal $2,000,000. When you inaugurated the Pacific Railroad Company, you required, I believe, but about two hundred thousand dollars to be paid in before you commenced to loan. This company is required to pay in and expend in the prosecution of this work $2,000,000, and when it has done that it has got to contribute $300,000 as often as you contribute $200,000; and that contribution—I speak of it so because others speak of it—is a loan. A loan to whom? To this company. It, the company, is worthless; it will not be repaid. Do you say that? Then your admissions fall to the ground, for you admit that the work is a necessary one, and you are only afraid the tolls will be too high and that it will do too much. If that assumption is correct, then the loan must be perfectly safe and the work will be built without costing the United States a dollar. Sir, I will not detain the Senate longer.

Mr. FESSENDEN. I move that the Senate adjourn.

Mr. GRIMES. Let us have an executive session.

Mr. FESSENDEN. I vary my motion and move an executive session.

Mr. HOWARD. I hope before that vote is taken I may be allowed to take up a certain bill.

Mr. HOWE. I hope the Senate will not go into executive session. Why not take a vote on the bill?

Mr. FESSENDEN. Because other gentlemen want to speak upon it, and it is late, and it is hot, and we have worked hard enough and long enough to-day.

Mr. HOWE. It is no hotter in the open Senate Chamber than it will be in the Chamber after the doors shall have been closed.

Mr. FESSENDEN. I presume there will not be much business to be attended to in executive session.

Mr. LANE, of Indiana. Only a minute for a matter I want attended to.

Mr. HOWE. I do not know any Senator who wants to speak on the bill.

Mr. FESSENDEN. I do.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The question is on the motion to proceed to the consideration of executive business.

The motion was agreed to; there being, on a division—ayes 19, noes 7; and, after some time spent in executive session the doors were reopened, and the Senate adjourned.

HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES.

THURSDAY, July 12, 1866.

The House met at twelve o'clock m. Prayer by the Chaplain, Rev. C. B. BOXTON.

Mr. DAVES. I move to dispense with the reading of the Journal.

Mr. LE BLOND. I object.

The Journal of yesterday was then read and approved.

ORDER OF BUSINESS.

Mr. STEVENS. I ask the consent of the House to allow us to take up and finish the amendments of the Senate to the legislative appropriation bill, so that we may conclude our action upon them and have a committee of conference appointed before we proceed to any other business. It will take but a few minutes, and it is very important.

Mr. LE BLOND. I would say that I suppose that by the rules the question that was raised by me last night in regard to the printing of the minority report of the joint committee on reconstruction has precedence of every other business. It will take but a few moments to dispose of it, and then I will have no objection to the proposition of the gentleman from Pennsylvania, [Mr. STEVENS.]

LEGISLATIVE APPROPRIATION BILL.

Mr. STEVENS. I will ask the House to agree to this proposition: that the recommendations of the Committee on Appropriations be concurred in, and that a committee of conference on the disagreeing votes of the two Houses be asked for.

Mr. LE BLOND. I have no objection to that.

No objection was made; and accordingly the recommendations of the Committee on Appropriations in regard to the amendments of the Senate to the legislative appropriation bill were agreed to and a committee of conference on the disagreeing votes of the two Houses was directed to be asked for.

PRINTING OF REPORTS.

The SPEAKER. The first business in order is the unfinished business pending at the adjournment of yesterday, being the question of privilege raised by the gentleman from Ohio [Mr. LE BLOND] in regard to the printing of the views of the minority of the joint committee on reconstruction, upon which he moved that a select committee of five be appointed to examine and report upon the same. The pending question is upon the motion of the gentleman from Illinois [Mr. WASHBURN] to amend the motion of the gentleman from Ohio [Mr. LE BLOND] so as to refer the subject to the Committee on Printing.

Mr. LE BLOND. I would like to make one suggestion to the House. This question seems to embrace the action of the Committee on Printing. Such being the case, it certainly would not be proper to refer that proposition to that committee for investigation.

Mr. WASHBURN, of Illinois. I understand that the matter is susceptible of the fullest and most complete investigation. And if the gentleman from Ohio [Mr. LE BLOND] will withdraw his motion for investigation, the chairman of the Committee on Printing, [Mr. LAFLIN], as soon as he can obtain the facts, will make an explanation which will undoubtedly satisfy him. If he does not make such explanation, then the gentleman from Ohio [Mr. LE BLOND] can ask for further action.

The SPEAKER. The Chair would state to the gentleman from Ohio [Mr. LE BLOND] that the question would again come up for consideration, whatever committee may be designated to consider it, whenever the committee shall report upon the subject.

Mr. LE BLOND. All that is very true. But I simply wish to say this: the volume in question has already been printed and bound, and no investigation that can be made by the Committee on Printing or by a select committee can change the character of the volume now. Now, I do not wish to have a committee raised particularly with the view to investigate the matter, which, let it result one way or the other, will produce no change. These volumes must now go to the country without the minority report. And all I wish to say in conclusion is, that whoever may have made that omission, made it in violation of the order of this House. And therefore they are sending to the country the majority report accompanied by the testimony, but without its antidote. And it strikes me, and I felt that that was the case when I made the motion I did last night, that it was intended to go to the country as an electioneering document, emanating from that committee, for that purpose, and that alone. And now they are sending it to the country without the minority report, which is a complete vindication of the position taken by the minority, and a complete answer to the position taken by the majority. With these remarks I withdraw my motion for an investigating committee, for it must fall as all others do, still-born.

Mr. ELDRIDGE. I object to the withdrawal of the motion. I understand that all these reports are not yet printed, and perhaps the action of this House may to some extent remedy the evil and prevent the mischief or wrong which otherwise will be inflicted.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Ohio [Mr. LE BLOND] has the right to withdraw his motion; but the gentleman from Wisconsin [Mr. ELDRIDGE] can renew it if he thinks proper.

Mr. ELDRIDGE. Then I renew the motion for a select committee of five to inquire into the matter and report the facts why the report of the minority was not included.

Mr. WASHBURN, of Illinois. I move to lay the whole subject on the table.

Mr. LAFLIN. Will the gentleman withdraw the motion until I can make a personal explanation?

Mr. WASHBURN, of Illinois. I will withdraw it for that purpose.

Mr. LAFLIN. Mr. Speaker, on the 13th day of March last the House adopted the following resolution:

"That twenty-five thousand extra copies of each of the reports of testimony taken by the joint select committee on reconstruction, together with the accompanying documents, be printed for the use of the House."

In accordance with that resolution the Superintendent of Public Printing, receiving the report of the testimony from the clerk of the committee on reconstruction, proceeded to execute the order of the House. The testimony was printed immediately after it was presented; and when the committee of fifteen made their report, as is always customary with all such reports, it was sent with the testimony to the bindery immediately upon its being printed. The House will bear in mind that after the presentation of the majority report some ten or twelve days elapsed before the minority made any report to the House. The Superintendent of Public Printing, acting under the direction of the House, printed twenty-five thousand copies of the report of this committee. There was no report from the minority of the committee at the time these were sent to the bindery; and if there had been—

Mr. LE BLOND. If the gentleman will permit me a moment, I will ask him whether this document was printed at the time the minority report was handed in. Will the gentleman say that it was printed at that time?

Mr. LAFLIN. I am not able to answer.

Mr. LE BLOND. Then I wish to ask the gentleman another question: whether the minority did not give notice at the time the majority report was handed in that they were preparing a minority report, and would hand it in to be published with the other, and whether it was not presented to the House eleven days after the majority report came in and the House received it for the purpose of publication with the majority report?

Mr. LAFLIN. Mr. Speaker, I do not understand that, when the House consented to receive the report from the minority, it consented at that time to the publication of that minority report. There was nothing said about that. But the fact is that the minority report was presented ten or eleven days after the report of the majority. At the time the minority report was presented a motion was made that fifty thousand extra copies of that report be printed. That motion was referred to our committee.

Mr. LE BLOND. Will the gentleman allow me to correct an error right here? The order of the House subsequently was that there should be so many copies of the majority and minority reports published together, but without the testimony.

Mr. LAFLIN. Will the gentleman permit me to finish? I see no reason why he should endeavor to anticipate what I am about to say. The Committee on Printing reported a resolution in favor of printing fifty thousand extra copies of the majority and the minority reports; and if I remember aright a motion was made on the other side of the House that these reports should be printed independently of each other. And now the great complaint is that they are not printed together, even in the books in which they were not ordered to be printed together.

Mr. HALE. Will the gentleman permit me to interrupt him a moment?

Mr. LAFLIN. Yes, sir.

Mr. HALE. According to my recollection, Mr. Speaker, the order of this House was express that the two reports should be printed together.

Mr. LAFLIN. If the gentlemen would only allow me to finish my statement, neither my colleague [Mr. HALE] nor the gentleman from Ohio [Mr. LE BLOND] would find the least necessity for asking me these questions.

Mr. HALE. The gentleman will excuse me. He finished his sentence, and, as I supposed, his statement. I asked leave to interrupt him, and did so with his permission. I do not perceive that I am guilty of any impropriety.

Mr. LAFLIN. Not at all. But I was going on to say that when the Committee on Printing reported, they reported in favor of printing fifty thousand extra copies of the majority and the minority reports together. The House amended this so as to print one hundred thousand copies of the majority and minority reports. That order of the House is now being executed; and we have here now the report of the joint committee on reconstruction, the majority and minority reports bound together, of which there are now being printed one hundred thousand copies. Now, this is the explanation of the matter.

Mr. HALE. I hope my colleague will allow me—

Mr. WILSON, of Iowa. Let me ask a question.

Mr. WASHBURN, of Illinois. I only withdrew the motion to lay upon the table to hear the explanation of the chairman of the Committee on Printing.

Mr. ELDRIDGE. I wish to know of the gentleman from New York, if to his knowledge or belief a single copy of this bound volume of testimony and the majority report was bound at the time when this House made the order to print the minority and majority reports together.

Mr. LAFLIN. I am not able to answer that question.

Mr. ELDRIDGE. I think that is the only material question here.

Mr. WILSON, of Iowa. I ask whether the House has ever made an order to have the majority and minority reports printed in one volume.

Mr. LAFLIN. At no time.

Mr. HALE. Let the resolution authorizing the publication of the report or reports be reported, so that we may know what it is.

Mr. ELDRIDGE. I should like to know of the gentleman from New York whether this volume is printed in accordance with the direction of the Committee on Printing; whether it is printed as they directed, without the minority report being included.

Mr. LAFLIN. I say that all matters printed are printed under the direction of the House, and not of the Committee on Printing. The Committee on Printing do not constitute themselves agents.

Mr. ELDRIDGE. I wish the gentleman would answer my question.

Mr. LAFLIN. They had no direction except as the House directs.

Mr. GRIDER. I wish to ask a question: whether there is any order of the House to print the testimony taken together with the report of the majority in one book?

The SPEAKER. The Clerk will read the resolution.

The Clerk read as follows:

"Resolved, That twenty-five thousand extra copies of each of the reports of testimony taken by the joint select committee on reconstruction, together with the accompanying documents, be printed without covers for the use of the House."

Mr. LE BLOND. I wish to say this in reference to that resolution, which in my judgment amounts to nothing more than the order of the House originally: gentlemen upon this floor who are old members understand well when there are majority and minority reports the House makes an order to print, which carries with it both the majority and minority reports; that the minority report is just as essential as the majority report itself in order to make the whole subject-matter complete; and when the chairman of the Committee on Public Printing undertakes to say to this House and the country—

Mr. FARNSWORTH rose.

Mr. LE BLOND. I cannot yield for a moment. I say when the chairman of the Committee on Public Printing undertakes to declare to this House and the country that that committee carried out the order of the House merely, he is saying to this House and the country what is in violation of every principle governing the subject of public printing in this or any other deliberative body. Sir, the remarks of the chairman of that committee convince me that this omission of the minority report was by order of that committee, and he undertakes to screen himself by giving a construction to the order of the House that is unwarranted.

Mr. FARNSWORTH. I ask whether an order to print the report carries both the majority and minority reports. Is there any such thing as a minority report recognized by the rules? What is usually called the minority report is nothing more than the views of the minority which are allowed to be printed by courtesy.

The SPEAKER. The Chair will state, in reply to the point made by the gentleman from Illinois, [Mr. FARNSWORTH,] that there is no such thing in parliamentary law known as a minority report. The report of the majority is the report of the committee. But parliamentary bodies always allow the minority to express their views in what is called the views of the minority. That is well understood, probably, by old members of the House.

Mr. LE BLOND. I think the gentleman from Illinois [Mr. FARNSWORTH] might read in vain to find in the rules of the House anything showing that the minority report shall accompany the majority. But the gentleman being a lawyer, knows that custom makes rules and laws that are just as binding as though they were written. There is scarcely a day passes in the transaction of business in this body, or any other deliberative body, when you do not find a minority report coming in and being published with the majority report. It has become so universal that it is not regarded as necessary to incorporate it into the rules of any deliberative body. It has become common law, and the necessity of such a thing is too apparent to everybody.

Look at it. Here you have a committee selected for the purpose of making an examination and investigation into some particular subject. The committee go to work and take testimony, and when they have concluded their labors they undertake to agree upon some fact that is established by this testimony. Here we have a committee of fifteen who have had under consideration the investigation of a plan for the reorganization of the States. When they undertake to come to a conclusion, as they did in this case, they find a portion in favor of one thing and a portion in favor of another. Perchance there may be a majority of only one upon the committee in favor of the report, and they publish that to the country for the purpose of communicating information. But, sir, the House is relieved of any common-law doctrine relative to the authority to print the minority report for the reason this House, under the notice given to the House at the time the majority report was handed in, that a minority report would soon be made, which was done, not only authorized it to be made but received it and ordered it to be printed, which should have been done.

Mr. WASHBURNE, of Illinois. I appeal to the gentleman not to trespass any further upon my courtesy. I merely gave way to the gentleman from New York [Mr. LAFLIN] to make his explanation.

Mr. LE BLOND. I believe I am speaking to a resolution introduced by the chairman of the committee, and I do not think I am indebted to the courtesy of the gentleman.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Ohio withdrew his question of privilege, and the gentleman from Wisconsin [Mr. ELDRIDGE] renewed it. The gentleman from Illinois [Mr. WASHBURNE] then took the floor and moved that it lie on the table.

Mr. ELDRIDGE. I thought I had the floor. The SPEAKER. The gentleman did have the floor, but he certainly was not making any remarks.

Mr. ELDRIDGE. I was slow of speech, and had not got through. [Laughter.]

Mr. LE BLOND. If the gentleman from Illinois [Mr. WASHBURNE] will indulge me five minutes I will be done.

Mr. WASHBURNE, of Illinois. I think that is cutting it rather fat after having spoken about ten minutes. [Laughter.]

Mr. LE BLOND. I know the kindly feeling of the gentleman.

Mr. WASHBURNE, of Illinois. I am pressed by other gentlemen around me who want to get at other business.

Mr. LE BLOND. Then I will give way.

Mr. HALE. Will the gentleman from Illinois yield for a suggestion?

Mr. WASHBURNE, of Illinois. Yes, sir.

Mr. HALE. My suggestion is this: that a charge is made by the minority of this House of an improper execution of an order of the House. The charge involves a question of privilege. Now, I have the most perfect confidence in my colleague, the chairman of the committee, [Mr. LAFLIN,] but I submit to gentlemen on both sides that the fact that such a charge is made by the minority is of itself sufficient to call imperatively for a proper investigation. It is a question of that character that no man can afford to disregard it.

Mr. WASHBURNE, of Illinois. I now renew my motion to lay the subject on the table.

Mr. ELDRIDGE. On that I demand the yeas and nays.

The yeas and nays were ordered.

The question was taken; and it was decided in the affirmative—yeas 84, nays 29, not voting 69; as follows:

YEAS—Messrs. Alley, Anderson, James M. Ashley, Baker, Banks, Barker, Baxter, Benjamin, Bingham, Boutwell, Bromwell, Broomall, Reader W. Wilson, Woodbridge, Winfield, and Wright—69.

So the whole subject was laid upon the table.

Mr. FINCK. I ask the unanimous consent of the House to introduce a resolution providing for the printing of one hundred thousand extra copies of the report of the minority of the committee on reconstruction.

Mr. WASHBURNE, of Illinois. I object.

ELECTION CONTEST—FULLER VERSUS DAWSON.

The House resumed the consideration of the contested-election case from the State of Pennsylvania, Dawson vs. Fuller, upon which the gentleman from Pennsylvania [Mr. LAWRENCE] was entitled to the floor.

Mr. LAWRENCE, of Pennsylvania. I yield to the gentleman from Wisconsin, [Mr. PAINE.]

Mr. PAINE. I wish to give notice to the House that the previous question on this case will not be called before half past three o'clock this afternoon, and it may not be called as early as that. I now move that the consideration of this case be postponed until after the termination of the morning hour in order to carry out the agreement I made yesterday with the chairman of the Committee on the Post Office and Post Roads.

The motion was agreed to.

Mr. PAINE. I repeat the notice that the previous question on the contested-election case will not be called before half past three o'clock to-day. I now insist on the regular order of business.

FOREIGN TELEGRAPHIC COMMUNICATION.

The SPEAKER proceeded, as the regular order of business, to call the committees for reports, resuming the call where it was suspended yesterday, with the Committee on the Post Office and Post Roads.

Mr. ALLEY. I wish to present, with the approval of the Committee on the Post Office and Post Roads, a bill for the better protection of international communication. It is thought by many to be necessary after the passage of the telegraph bill.

The bill was read a first and second time. It provides that no line of magnetic telegraph cable or cables from foreign shores shall be landed, maintained, or operated on or over the coast or shores of the United States without special permission of Congress.

Mr. ALLEY. I call the previous question on the bill.

Mr. HALE. Allow me to offer an amendment to the bill.

Mr. ALLEY. I cannot yield for amendments.

Mr. HALE. I hope the gentleman will allow me to point out what I think is a very serious defect in the bill.

Mr. ALLEY. I have shown the bill to a great many gentlemen, who saw no objection to it. It seems to me that it is very plain. I believe it is almost precisely the amendment proposed yesterday by the gentleman from Illinois, [Mr. WASHBURN], and I think the gentleman from New York can have no objection to it. But if there is really any objection to the bill I shall not press it at this time, but shall move that it be recommitted.

Mr. JOHNSON. I want to ask the gentleman from Massachusetts [Mr. ALLEY] a question. I understood him to state that the Committee on the Post Office and Post Roads had agreed to this bill. I desire to inquire of him when the committee had this bill before them. This is the first time I ever heard of it.

Mr. ALLEY. The gentleman misunderstood me. I stated to the House, as they will remember, that it received the approval of the committee. I presented it this morning to every member of the committee, I believe, but the gentleman from Pennsylvania, [Mr. JOHNSON], who was not in the House at the time, and they all approved it.

Mr. JOHNSON. Then it was not considered by the committee at all as a committee.

Mr. ALLEY. I insist upon my motion to recommit, and upon that motion I call the previous question.

Mr. HALE. I really wish the gentleman from Massachusetts [Mr. ALLEY] would allow somebody to point out the defects in this bill. But if the House is of opinion that it ought not to be done—

Mr. ALLEY. I have offered this bill because I believed there could be no possible objection to it. But there are persons in this House, I know, who want to delay the business.

Mr. HALE. I rise to a question of order. I inquire by what authority this bill comes before the House.

The SPEAKER. The Chair thinks it is too late now to raise a point of order in regard to the reception of the bill, though it probably would have been a good point if it had been made in time.

Mr. HALE. My point of order is this: this bill was introduced without any one having an opportunity to object to it, supposing it came regularly from the committee. I now understand that no such bill has ever been referred to or considered by the committee as a committee, and therefore it comes here irregularly.

The SPEAKER. The question of reception can be raised only when the measure is offered; but after the House has considered a measure it is too late to raise the question.

Mr. HALE. If I had not supposed that the gentleman from Massachusetts [Mr. ALLEY] had been authorized to report the bill, I should have objected to its reception.

Mr. FARNSWORTH. If my recollection is correct, when the bill was presented by the gentleman from Massachusetts [Mr. ALLEY] it was stated either by the Chair or by the Clerk—probably by the Chair—

The SPEAKER. By the Chair, in the usual form.

Mr. FARNSWORTH. It was stated by the Chair that "the gentleman from Massachusetts, from the Committee on the Post Office and Post Roads, reported the following bill." I supposed that it was a report from the committee; so did gentlemen who sit around me. And I think it was so understood by the Chair.

The SPEAKER. It was. But if the point of order can be made now it can be made after two or three hours' discussion.

Mr. HALE. I wish to call further attention to the point of order; and that is, that the objection was made at the first moment that the fact was disclosed to the House that the report was irregularly made.

The SPEAKER. That may be. But if the debate on this bill had been continued for two days before that fact was disclosed, it is evident that the objection would be too late. The question upon the reception can be raised only when the measure is introduced, and it is generally made by some member of the committee who dissents from it, and who discloses the fact that the committee had not formally authorized the report.

Mr. SCHENCK. I rise to a question of order upon this state of facts; the Speaker will correct me if I am wrong. I understand that this morning the floor was yielded by the member of the Committee of Elections [Mr. PAINE] to the gentleman from Massachusetts, [Mr. ALLEY], the chairman of the Committee on the Post Office and Post Roads, to continue making reports from his committee. A bill was introduced purporting to come from the Committee on the Post Office and Post Roads; it was announced from the Clerk's desk, and read by the Clerk as a report from that committee. In the course of its consideration the fact was disclosed that the bill was not from the committee, but was an outside report. Now, the point I make is that if the question of reception is raised as soon as the fact is disclosed that is soon enough to raise the question. And if it were two days or two weeks after it was presented that the fact is disclosed that the House has been misled into believing that it was acting upon the report of a committee, when such was not the fact, it is then time enough to make objection to it. That which purported to be a report has been made; it has not been acted upon in any way. Before it has been acted on this disclosure is made, and the House comes into the possession of the knowledge that it is not a report from the committee. Then the gentleman from New York [Mr. HALE] makes his objection.

The SPEAKER. The Chair overrules the point of order upon the ground that the uniform usage of the House has been different. When a report is presented, and it is disputed whether the report has been authorized to be made, the question can be raised whether the House will receive and consider the report. In this case the report has been received and considered. The point of order, therefore, is too late.

Mr. SCHENCK. How can the House know, at the moment of the presentation of a report, whether the committee have authorized the presentation of that report?

The SPEAKER. It is true that the House may not know; but the point cannot be raised after the report has been received and debate upon it continued at some length. The Chair will state an illustration which is in point. The chairman of the Committee on Military Affairs [Mr. SCHENCK] might report an Army bill, and after the House had been engaged for a week or two in the consideration of the bill, the point might be raised that the bill had never been formally agreed upon in the committee-room. It would certainly be too late then to entertain the question, "Will the House receive and consider this report?" for it would already have been received and considered.

Mr. SCHENCK. Well, sir, there ought to be a remedy somewhere.

Mr. FARNSWORTH. I rise to a point of order. How can a motion be made to recommit this bill when it has never been committed?

The SPEAKER. Because it has been treated by the House as having been reported by the committee, the report having been made by the chairman.

Mr. GARFIELD. I rise to a question of order. I wish to inquire why this is not a report from the committee. Is it necessary that the committee should have gone into their committee-room and acted? The chairman of the committee has stated that he had the consent of every member of the committee save one to the reporting of the bill, that consent being obtained on this floor. Now, I have known dozens of cases in which reports of this kind have been made and received, the committee having had a consultation, but not in the committee-room. Some gentlemen near me say that this subject was never referred to that committee, either by petition or bill. I answer that the subject of this very telegraph bill has been referred by the House to the committee.

The SPEAKER. Both the usage and the rule of the House are against the point as suggested by the gentleman from Ohio, [Mr. GARFIELD.] The report of a committee, to be legal in the parliamentary sense, must be the result of the action of the committee in session, upon the call of the chairman or two members. On page 54 of Barclay's Digest it is stated that "a committee meet when and where they please if the House has not ordered time and place for them; but they can only act when together, and not by separate consultation and consent, nothing being the report of a committee but what has been agreed to in committee actually assembled."

Mr. GARFIELD. I desire to ask the Chair whether he does not recollect—

Mr. ALLEY. To obviate all difficulty, I move that this whole subject be laid on the table.

Mr. GARFIELD. Mr. Speaker, I believe that I am entitled to the floor.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Ohio [Mr. GARFIELD] is upon the floor on a question of order. If he has not concluded the presentation of his point, he will proceed.

Mr. GARFIELD. I desire to remind the Speaker that last winter a bill reported from the Committee on Military Affairs being rejected in this House, the members of the committee consulted upon this floor and agreed upon a substitute, which, in less than five minutes, the chairman reported from that committee. Objection was made by other members of the committee; and answer was made that the consultation had been had here; and the bill was reported by the chairman as from the committee.

Mr. SCHENCK. I desire to correct the statement of my colleague, [Mr. GARFIELD.]

The SPEAKER. The Chair will first respond to the point of order which has been presented. Very often the chairman of a committee states, when the question is raised, that he has been authorized by the action of the committee to report a substitute or an amended bill; he takes upon himself the responsibility of declaring that he has the authority of the committee. In such a case, of course, the Chair accepts the statement and entertains the report.

Mr. SCHENCK. I wish to add a word with reference to the facts in the case to which my colleague has referred. In that case no question was made as to where the committee had assembled. The members of the committee did, in fact, get together and agree upon a report, although they did not assemble in their committee-room. The point made in that case was that the committee could not have met, because the report had been agreed upon during the session of the House; and that was answered by showing from the record that the Committee on Military Affairs had authority to meet during the sessions of the House, which the Chair considered as a sufficient answer to the objection.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Massachusetts [Mr. ALLEY] moves that the whole subject be laid on the table.

Mr. HALE. I hope the gentleman will withdraw that motion, in order that—

Mr. ALLEY. I insist on the motion.

The question being taken, there were—ayes 35, noes 39; no quorum voting.

The SPEAKER, under the rule, ordered tellers; and appointed Mr. ALLEY, and Mr. WASHBURN of Illinois.

Mr. ALLEY withdrew the motion to lay upon the table.

Mr. WASHBURN, of Illinois. This is to supply an omission in the bill hurried through yesterday, to which I called the gentleman's attention without effect. I well knew if he undertook to pass that bill in the shape in which he did this question would arise, that it would permit any company of any foreign nation to land telegraph wires upon your shore and you cannot help it.

Mr. ALLEY. The gentleman from Illinois was in favor of the passage of the bill. He told me so. His object was an ulterior one. His object was to prevent our getting at other bills which he was opposed to.

Mr. WASHBURN, of Illinois. The gentleman has no authority to make an assertion of that kind; and when he makes it he makes an unwarranted assertion. I was in favor of his bill, in good faith, if I could get such an amendment in which he now comes here and asks us to pass.

Mr. ALLEY. I insist on the demand for the previous question.

The previous question was seconded and the main question ordered.

The House divided; and there were—ayes 64, noes 31.

So the bill was recommitted.

Mr. HALE moved to reconsider the vote by which the bill was recommitted; and also moved that the motion to reconsider be laid on the table.

The latter motion was agreed to.

BRIDGE ACROSS THE MISSISSIPPI.

Mr. ALLEY, from the Committee on the Post Office and Post Roads, reported back Senate bill No. 236, to authorize the construction of certain bridges, and to establish them as post roads, with amendments; and he also gave notice he would move as an amendment a bill for the construction of a bridge at Clinton, Iowa.

Mr. HALE. Does this bill come regularly before the House? Has it been referred to that committee, and has the committee authorized it to be reported?

The SPEAKER. So far as the Chair is aware it is regularly before the House.

Mr. HALE. My object is to see whether this bill comes before the House in the same manner as the one just recommitted.

The SPEAKER. If the gentleman makes a point of order he must state some specific ground for objecting, on which the Chair will rule.

Mr. HALE. I want to know whether the bill is regularly reported.

The SPEAKER. The bill is indorsed as having been referred to that committee.

Mr. HALE. That is satisfactory.

The bill was read, as follows:

Be it enacted by the Senate and House of Representatives of the United States of America in Congress assembled, That it shall be lawful for any person or persons, company or corporation, having authority from the States of Illinois and Missouri for such purpose, to build a bridge across the Mississippi river at Quincy, Illinois, and to lay on and over said bridge railway tracks, for the more perfect connection of any railroads that are or shall be constructed to the said river at or opposite said point, and that when constructed all trains of all roads terminating at said river, at or opposite said point, shall be allowed to cross said bridge for reasonable compensation, to be made to the owners of said bridge, under the limitations and conditions hereinafter provided. And in case of any litigation to the free navigation of said river, the cause may be tried before the district court of the United States of any State in which any portion of said obstruction or bridge touches.

Sec. 2. And be it further enacted, That any bridge built under the provisions of this act may, at the option of the company building the same, be built as a draw-bridge, with a pivot or other form of draw, or with unbroken or continuous spans: Provided, That if the said bridge shall be made with unbroken and continuous spans, it shall not be of less elevation in any case than fifty feet above high-water mark, as understood at the point of location, to the bottom chord of the bridge, nor shall the spans of said bridge be less than two hundred and fifty feet in length, and the piers of said bridge shall be parallel with the current of the river, and the main span shall be over the main channel of the river, and not less than three hundred feet in length: And provided also, That if any bridge built under this act shall be constructed as a draw-bridge, the same shall be constructed as a pivot-draw-bridge, with a draw over the main channel of the river at an accessible and navigable point, and with spans of not less than one hundred and sixty feet in length in the clear on each side of the central or pivot pier of the draw, and the next adjoining spans to the draw shall not be less than two hundred and fifty feet; and said spans shall not be less than thirty feet above low-water mark, and not less than ten above extreme high-water mark, measuring to the bottom chord of the bridge, and the piers of said bridge shall be parallel with the current of the river: And provided also, That said draw shall be opened promptly upon reasonable signal for the passage of boats whose construction shall not be such as to admit of their passage under the permanent spans of said bridge, except when trains are passing over the same; but in no case shall unnecessary delay occur in opening the said draws after the passage of trains.

Sec. 3. And be it further enacted, That any bridge constructed under this act, and according to its limitations, shall be a lawful structure, and shall be recognized and known as a post route; upon which also no higher charge shall be made for the transmission over the same of the mails, the troops, and the munitions of war of the United States than the rate per mile paid for their transportation over the railroad or public highways leading to the said bridge.

Sec. 4. And be it further enacted, That it shall be lawful for the Chicago, Burlington, and Quincy Railroad Company, a corporation whose road has been completed to the Mississippi river, and connects with a railroad on the opposite side thereof, having first obtained authority therefor from the States of Illinois and Iowa, to construct a railroad bridge across said river, upon the same terms, in the same manner, under the same restrictions, and with the same privileges as is provided for in this act in relation to the bridge at Quincy, Illinois.

Sec. 5. And be it further enacted, That a bridge may be constructed at the town of Hannibal, in the State of Missouri, across the Mississippi river, so as to connect the Hannibal and St. Joseph railroad with the Pike County and Great Western railroads of Illinois, on the same terms and subject to the same restrictions as contained in this act for the construction of the bridge at Quincy, Illinois.

First amendment:

In section two insert "during or;" so it will read, "but in no case shall unnecessary delay occur in opening the said draws during or after the passage of trains."

The amendment was agreed to.

Second amendment:

Insert:

And be it further enacted, That a bridge may be constructed across the Mississippi river between Prairie Du Chien, in the State of Wisconsin, and North McGregor, in the State of Iowa, with the consent of the Legislatures of Wisconsin and Iowa, on the same terms and under the same restrictions as are contained in this act for the construction of a bridge at Quincy, Illinois.

Mr. ALLISON. Will the gentleman yield for a question?

Mr. ALLEY. Yes, sir.

Mr. ALLISON. I desire to ask the gentleman from Massachusetts [Mr. ALLEY] what has become of an amendment that was sent to the committee by my colleague, authorizing any railroad companies whose lines terminate on the Mississippi river to build bridges on the terms and specifications of this bill; or if it is the design of the committee only to authorize special railroads to build these bridges at particular specified points, excluding other companies from the benefits of this bill. Why not propose a general provision that will include every railroad that wishes to cross the Mississippi river?

Mr. ALLEY. The committee were of opinion, I think unanimously, that it was improper to pass a general law of that kind. So they considered all the cases that were presented upon their merits separately, and it was on that ground that the amendment offered by the gentleman from Iowa was rejected.

Mr. FINCK. I desire to say that I understood distinctly that all the amendments came from the committee without any recommendation whatever.

Mr. ALLEY. My colleague will allow me to correct him. The amendments were adopted by the committee, I think by a unanimous vote, with the understanding that the bill itself was to be reported to the House without recommendation; but if the House in its judgment should think best to pass the bill, then it was thought proper on the part of the committee that these amendments should be adopted.

Mr. FINCK. I desire to state to my colleague that I cannot be mistaken on this subject. I was opposed in the committee, as I am here, not only to the bill, but to the amendments, and it was only with the understanding that the whole subject should be referred to the House that we consented to report them without any recommendation. Certainly I could not favor the amendments when they involve precisely the points of the bill itself.

Mr. FARNSWORTH. I rise to a point of order. It is improper to state what takes place in committee.

The SPEAKER. The Chair sustains the point of order. Statements can only be made in writing, in the conclusions of their report.

Mr. KASSON. Will the gentleman from Massachusetts [Mr. ALLEY] allow me a word?

Mr. ALLEY. Yes, sir.

Mr. KASSON. Several inquiries have been made touching the amendment I offered, which was referred to the committee, proposing to grant a general right to all railroad companies upon reaching that river to bridge it upon the same terms. Now, I wish to say that I waived that amendment for two reasons. One was that my colleague of the district in which Keokuk is situated had an amendment which covered the object I had in view; and the other was, that I thought the privilege was a little too much to take away entirely the discretion of Congress in all cases as to where it should allow that river to be bridged. I thought the special attention of Congress should be called in each case to the points to be bridged, and that that discretion might be exercised at the time the privilege was asked. I therefore cheerfully waived that amendment, and in lieu of it agreed to accept that which my colleague from the first district will offer.

Mr. WASHBURN, of Illinois. I wish to state what perhaps may be a question of order, in order to call the attention of the House to what our legislation has already been on this subject, and I particularly desire to direct the attention of the gentleman from Massachusetts—

Mr. ALLEY. I do not give way for that purpose.

Mr. WASHBURN, of Illinois. I hope we shall have a fair discussion. There has seldom been in this country a question of so much interest as this.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Massachusetts declines to yield.

Mr. HOGAN. Will the gentleman yield to me only for a question?

Mr. ALLEY. I will after we get the bill in a proper shape.

Mr. HOGAN. It is merely a preliminary question.

Mr. ALLEY. I will yield.

Mr. HOGAN. I ask the gentleman whether we have not during this session directed the Secretary of War to make a survey of the Mississippi river, with a view to ascertain where bridges can be built; and whether it would not be proper to defer further action until that matter is settled.

Mr. ALLEY. I believe it is true that the Secretary of War has been instructed to make a survey, but I see nothing in this bill incompatible with that action, if this House sees fit to pass it. The Senate has passed the bill, and I believe by a very large vote, notwithstanding the action of the Senate and the House upon the subject to which the gentleman refers.

Now, Mr. Speaker, I wish it distinctly understood between myself and my colleague on the committee [Mr. FINCK] how this matter stands. I think he will agree with me if he understands my statement, which is this: that I was instructed to report back this bill without any recommendation. The committee were undecided in regard to it, but with regard to the amendments they were unanimously of the opinion that as they involved the same principle, if the bill itself was passed, there could be no objection to the amendments. It was on that ground, and that alone, that they agreed to the amendments. Am I right?

Mr. FINCK. I hardly think there will be any difference between the gentleman and myself when we come to understand each other. I understand that these amendments involve the same principle as is involved in the bill itself, and an opposition to the bill would be an opposition to the amendments. There is no doubt that the gentleman was authorized to report the amendments. I do not concur in the amendments, nor do I concur in the bill.

Mr. ALLEY. I did not mean to intimate to the House that the gentleman from Ohio, my colleague on the committee, did approve of these amendments. But they stand upon the same ground as the bill, and if the House should decide that the bill itself should pass, then there is no reason in the world for the exclusion of these bridges provided for in the amendments.

Mr. RANDALL, of Pennsylvania. I desire to make a motion, and in support of that motion I desire to say a word or two.

Mr. ALLEY. I cannot yield now.

Mr. WASHBURN, of Illinois. What is the question before the House?

The SPEAKER. The question is on the demand for the previous question on the second amendment reported from the Committee on the Post Office and Post Roads.

Mr. RANDALL, of Pennsylvania. I desire to move to recommit the bill to the committee with a view of having a report.

The SPEAKER. That motion is not in order pending the demand for the previous question.

Mr. RANDALL, of Pennsylvania. Then I hope the House will not sustain the previous question, so that I can make my motion, and on it I desire to say a single word.

Mr. ALLEY. I cannot yield for any such purpose.

Mr. RANDALL, of Pennsylvania. You will certainly hear me.

Mr. ALLEY. The gentleman must allow the bill to be perfected.

Mr. RANDALL, of Pennsylvania. I want the committee to perfect the bill.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Massachusetts must either insist on the demand for the previous question or withdraw it.

Mr. ALLEY. I insist upon it.

The question was put upon seconding the demand for the previous question; and there were—ayes 57, noes 36.

So the previous question was seconded.

The main question was then ordered; and being put, the second amendment was agreed to.

The third amendment reported by the committee was read, as follows:

Add the following as an additional section:
SEC. 7. And be it further enacted, That the right to alter or amend this so as to prevent or remove all material obstructions to the navigation of said river by the construction of bridges is hereby expressly reserved.

Mr. ALLEY. I yield now to the gentleman from Iowa, [Mr. WILSON.]

Mr. WILSON, of Iowa. I move to amend the amendment by adding to it the following:

And be it further enacted, That the Keokuk and Hamilton Mississippi Bridge Company be, and is hereby, authorized to construct and maintain a bridge over the Mississippi river between Keokuk, Iowa, and Hamilton, Illinois, of the same character, description, and construction as provided in this act for the bridges at Quincy and Burlington, and the said bridge, in its use and operation, shall be subject to the same restrictions that apply to said bridges at Quincy and Burlington by the terms of this act.

Mr. WILSON, of Iowa. I desire to say that this is one of the most important railroad crossings on the river; and if any bridge should be made, it should be this one. I ask the previous question on the amendment to the amendment.

Mr. WASHBURN, of Illinois. I would ask if this amendment to the amendment is recommended by the Committee on the Post Office and Post Roads.

Mr. ALLEY. It has not received the formal approbation of the committee, but I believe the majority of the committee, considering that it involved the same principle as the other amendment, made no objection to it.

The previous question was seconded and the main question ordered; and under the operation thereof the amendment to the amendment was agreed to.

Mr. WILSON, of Iowa, moved to reconsider the vote by which the amendment to the amendment was agreed to; and also moved that the motion to reconsider be laid on the table.

The latter motion was agreed to.

The question recurred upon the amendment as amended.

Mr. WINDOM. I move to further amend the amendment by adding thereto the following:

And that the Winona and St. Peter's Railroad Company, a corporation existing under the laws of the State of Minnesota, is hereby authorized to construct and operate a railroad bridge across the Mississippi river between the city of Winona, in the State of Minnesota, to the opposite bank of said river, in the State of Wisconsin, with the consent of the Legislatures of the States of Minnesota and Wisconsin; and said bridge by this section authorized is hereby declared a post route, and subject to all the terms, restrictions, and requirements contained in the foregoing sections of this act.

This amendment stands in precisely the same relation to the bill as the one just now passed, offered by the gentleman from Iowa, [Mr. WILSON.] I believe a majority of the Committee on the Post Office and Post Roads are in favor of it, though I was requested to offer it. I now call the previous question on the adoption of the amendment to the amendment.

Mr. COBB. I have abundant reason to oppose this amendment to the amendment, and I hope the House will not sustain the call for the previous question.

Mr. WASHBURN, of Illinois. I ask the gentleman from Minnesota [Mr. WINDOM] to withdraw for a moment his call for the previous question. This subject involves a matter of two bridges which were discussed for perhaps a whole day in the Senate. It is certainly a question which this House ought to understand before they vote upon it; and I trust the gentleman from Minnesota [Mr. WINDOM] will not press his demand for the previous question until the House can understand precisely what it is that they are asked to pass upon. It is a matter in which the gentleman from Wisconsin [Mr. PAINE] and one half of the people of Wisconsin are deeply interested.

Mr. PAINE. The gentleman is right; I am very much interested in having it adopted.

Mr. WINDOM. I insist upon the call for the previous question.

The question was taken; and upon a division there were—ayes 52, noes 39; no quorum voting.

Mr. COBB. I ask for tellers upon seconding the call for the previous question.

Tellers were ordered; and Mr. WINDOM, and Mr. WASHBURN, of Illinois, were appointed.

The House again divided; and the tellers reported—ayes 60, noes 35.

So the previous question was seconded.

The question recurred upon ordering the main question to be put.

Mr. WASHBURN, of Illinois. Upon that I ask for the yeas and nays.

The yeas and nays were not ordered.

The question was taken; and upon a division there were—ayes 62, noes 31.

So the main question was ordered, which was upon the amendment of Mr. WINDOM to the amendment.

Mr. WASHBURN, of Illinois. Upon that question I call for the yeas and nays.

The yeas and nays were ordered.

The question was taken; and it was decided in the affirmative—yeas 80, nays 34, not voting 68; as follows:

YEAS—Messrs. Alley, Ames, Baker, Banks, Baxter, Bergen, Bidwell, Bingham, Bromwell, Bundy, Sidney Clarke, Coffroth, Conkling, Cook, Darling, Defrees, Donnelly, Driggs, Eckley, Eldridge, Farquhar, Ferry, Garfield, Glossbrenner, Grider, Grinnell, Hart, Henderson, Higby, Holmes, Hotchkiss, Asahel W. Randall, Raymond, John H. Rice, Rollins, Rousseau, Sawyer, Seefeldt, Thayer, Francis Thomas, John L. Thomas, Van Aernam, Robert T. Van Horn, Henry D. Washburn, William B. Washburn, Wentworth, Whaley, Windom, and Woodbridge—80.

NAYS—Messrs. Allison, Ancona, Anderson, Benjamin, Broomall, Buckland, Reader W. Clarke, Cobb, Deming, Eggleston, Eliot, Finck, Hale, Aaron Harding, Hogan, Kerr, Ketcham, Kuykendall, George V. Lawrence, McCullough, Mercier, Niblack, Neill, O'Neill, Ritter, Rogers, Ross, Schenck, Shanklin, Spaulding, Taber, Taylor, Thornton, and Elihu B. Washburne—34.

NOT VOTING—Messrs. Deloe, R. Ashley, James

M. Ashley, Baldwin, Barker, Beaman, Blaine, Blow, Boutwell, Boyer, Brandegee, Chanler, Cullom, Culver, Davis, Dawes, Dawson, Delano, Denison, Dixon, Dodge, Dumont, Farnsworth, Goodyear, Griswold, Abner C. Harding, Harris, Hayes, Hill, Hooper, Chester D. Hubbard, Edwin N. Hubbell, Hulburd, Humphrey, Johnson, Jones, Latham, Longyear, Lynch, Marshall, McIndoe, Moorhead, Morrill, Nicholson, Patterson, Phelps, Radford, Samuel J. Randall, Alexander H. Rice, Shellabarger, Sitgreaves, Sloan, Smith, Starr, Stevens, Stillwell, Strouse, Trimble, Trowbridge, Upson, Burt Van Horn, Ward, Warner, Welker, Williams, James F. Wilson, Stephen F. Wilson, Winfield, and Wright—68.

So the amendment to the amendment was agreed to.

Mr. WINDOM moved to reconsider the vote by which the amendment to the amendment was agreed to; and also moved that the motion to reconsider be laid on the table.

The latter motion was agreed to.

Mr. WASHBURN, of Illinois. Has the morning hour expired?

The SPEAKER. It has, and the bill goes over until Saturday morning next.

PRINTING OF TAX LAWS.

Mr. LAFLIN, from the Committee on Printing, reported the following resolution; which was read, considered, and agreed to:

Resolved, That there be printed for the use of the House twenty-thousand copies of the internal tax laws, as they shall stand after incorporating provisions of the act recently passed, so that as far as is practicable the provisions of the different laws upon the same matter shall be printed in connection.

POST ROADS.

Mr. ALLEY, by unanimous consent, from the Committee on the Post Office and Post Roads, reported back Senate bill No. 369, to establish certain post roads.

The reading of the bill was dispensed with.

Mr. ALLEY stated that the bill contained nothing but provisions for post roads.

The bill was ordered to a third reading; and it was accordingly read the third time and passed.

Mr. ALLEY moved to reconsider the vote by which the bill was passed; and also moved that the motion to reconsider be laid upon the table.

The latter motion was agreed to.

Mr. ALLEY, by unanimous consent, from the same committee, also reported a bill to establish certain post roads; which was read a first and second time, ordered to be engrossed and read a third time; and being engrossed, it was accordingly read the third time and passed.

Mr. ALLEY moved to reconsider the vote by which the bill was passed; and also moved that the motion to reconsider be laid upon the table.

The latter motion was agreed to.

DEPUTY COLLECTOR AT PORTLAND, OREGON.

On motion of Mr. HIGBY, the Committee on Appropriations were discharged from the further consideration of the matter of increase of pay of the deputy collector at Portland, Oregon, and the same was referred to the Committee on Commerce.

PAY OF CLERKS.

On motion of Mr. HIGBY, the Committee on Appropriations was discharged from the further consideration of a petition in reference to the pay of clerks, and the same was referred to the Committee of Ways and Means.

TAPPING GOVERNMENT WATER-PIPES.

Mr. F. THOMAS, by unanimous consent, introduced a bill in relation to the unlawful tapping of the Government water-pipes; which was read a first and second time and referred to the Committee on the Judiciary.

ABELARD GUTHRIE.

Mr. SPALDING. I move that the Committee on Appropriations be discharged from the further consideration of the claim of Abelard Guthrie, and that the same be referred to the Committee of Elections.

Mr. DAWES. I should like to have the gentleman give some reason why it should be so referred. The Committee of Elections had the case before them and reported it back. It was then referred to the Committee of Claims, and on being reported back from that committee it was referred to the Committee on Appropriations. If it is going around again, why not have it done to-day?

Mr. SPALDING. If the Committee of Elections will report this man has a good case, then the Committee on Appropriations will report to pay him.

Mr. DAWES. The Committee of Elections and the Committee of Claims have reported several times.

Mr. SPALDING. The Committee of Claims reported against it.

Mr. SCHENCK. It has been referred four or five times, and there seems to be no possibility of this man having his claim considered by the House.

Mr. PAINE. I move to refer it to the Committee on Revisal and Unfinished Business.

The SPEAKER. That committee is composed of four chairmen of principal committees.

There was no objection, and it was so ordered.

MESSAGE FROM THE SENATE.

A message from the Senate, by Mr. FORNEY, its Secretary, announced that the Senate had insisted on its amendments disagreed to by the House to the bill (H. R. No. 261) making appropriations for the consular and diplomatic expenses of the Government for the year ending 30th June, 1867, and for other purposes; had disagreed to the amendments of the House to the ninth amendment of the Senate; had agreed to the conference asked by the House, and had appointed Messrs. SUMNER, TRUMBULL, and GRIMES conferees on the part of the Senate.

The message further announced that the Senate had passed the bill (H. R. No. 727) entitled "An act declaratory of an act entitled 'An act authorizing the Secretary of the Treasury to issue registers to vessels in certain cases,' approved February 10, 1866," with amendments, in which the concurrence of the House was requested.

The message also announced that the Senate had passed a bill (S. No. 414) entitled "An act to regulate the times and manner of holding elections for Senators in Congress," in which the concurrence of the House was requested.

ELECTION OF SENATORS.

On motion of Mr. COOK, Senate bill No. 414, to regulate the time and manner of holding elections for Senators was ordered to be printed.

ENROLLED BILL SIGNED.

Mr. COBB, from the Committee on Enrolled Bills, reported that they had examined and found truly enrolled a bill of the Senate of the following title; when the Speaker signed the same:

A bill (S. No. 357) to aid in the construction of telegraph lines, and to secure to the Government the use of the same for postal, military, and other purposes.

ELECTION CONTEST—AGAIN.

The SPEAKER stated the regular order of business was the consideration of the report of the Committee of Elections in the case of Fuller vs. Dawson, from the twenty-first congressional district of Pennsylvania, on which the gentleman from Pennsylvania [Mr. LAWRENCE] was entitled to the floor.

Mr. LAWRENCE, of Pennsylvania. Mr. Speaker, there is no man in this House more averse to public speaking than I am, and nothing but an imperative sense of duty to the contestant, who is a personal acquaintance and esteemed friend, and to the Union men of the twenty-first district of Pennsylvania, induces me now to trespass on the attention of the House. I know almost all of these and know how anxious they have been and are to be properly represented, and there is not a more worthy or intelligent set of men in any district in the State. They feel and have felt that great injustice is and has been done them, because by the soldier vote the sitting member was defeated in 1862, and Mr. Stewart, of Indiana, a competent and intelligent gentleman, elected over him.

Mr. DAWSON. I never heard that urged before.

Mr. LAWRENCE, of Pennsylvania. I repeat that the sitting member was defeated; the exact majority I cannot give, but have heard it was at least 50 votes, and perhaps more.

Mr. DAWSON. This is the first time I ever heard this urged, either here or in my district.

Mr. LAWRENCE, of Pennsylvania. If the gentleman denies it, then there is a question of veracity between us, for I assert it on the authority of the gentleman then elected and others. This district is composed of Fayette, Westmoreland, and Indiana counties, and is a close district—perhaps the Democrats have a small majority, but Dr. Fuller, the contestant, being a popular man, received more than the party vote, and I believe was duly and honestly elected, as was Mr. Stewart, in 1862. The latter was urged to contest the seat, but as the Democratic court of our State had declared the act authorizing the soldiers to vote unconstitutional, he did not contest. Yet the decision in the case of Baldwin against Trowbridge, decided this session, would have covered his case fully, and set aside that decision and making Congress the judge in the case of its own members. Had this case then been contested there can be little doubt the seat would have been awarded to Stewart.

I do not pretend that this is an argument against the sitting member, and only refer to it to show how unfortunate the district has been; and, I repeat, they feel, and justly so, that they have been misrepresented during the last Congress.

I will now come to the report of the committee, upon which members seem to rely, even without examining it. I have had members of the House tell me again and again that they never examined the report, but took it for granted that if the Committee of Elections reported in favor of the sitting member they were bound to take that report. I confess that I have done that myself in one or two instances which I am free to say I should have examined for myself. Now, sir, I undertake to say that if every member of the House had listened to the argument of my colleague on the committee [Mr. SCOFIELD] yesterday, there would not be five fair-minded men in the House who would have dared to vote in favor of the sitting member. I do not charge the committee with dishonesty by any means. I believe there is not a committee in this House composed of more honorable, high-minded, and intelligent men than that committee. But I say the majority of them are mistaken in indorsing this report.

Let me refer to the gentleman who wrote the report, [Mr. PAINE.] In his remarks yesterday he referred to something which the gentleman from Pennsylvania said to him. As I made the statement, of course he means me. I admit that I said I could find only two members of the committee that agreed to the report, and that is true. I did not talk with all the members of the committee, but I ascertained that the chairman of the committee [Mr. DAWES] and the gentleman from Wisconsin [Mr. PAINE] agreed to the report, and no other member of the committee. I afterward found that the gentleman from Missouri [Mr. McCLELLAN] had agreed to it. Now, how does it stand? It appears from the record that five members signed or agreed to the report. Now, I have as much respect for my friend from Illinois [Mr. MARSHALL] and his Democratic colleagues as any gentleman in this House; but we all know that they always sign the report in favor of their party, and that the party supports them. You cannot find an instance this session in which they have not done it.

Mr. ROGERS. I will state the reason. It is because every Democrat who has been turned out has been wrongfully turned out.

Mr. LAWRENCE, of Pennsylvania. Well, I will not undertake to say whether that is so or not. I voted with the committee myself, believing that they did not err in the matter; but I say now that I can figure for myself and am able to understand the facts that are presented in this case, and I know that Mr. Fuller had a majority of the votes cast in this district. And there is not an honest man in the district, who can read and reflect, who does not believe it, and that there has been a great outrage perpetrated by this report. But how is it in regard to the committee? The gentleman from Ohio, [Mr. SHELLABARGER], the gentleman from Pennsylvania, [Mr. SCOFIELD], the gentleman from Vermont, [Mr. BAXTER], and the gentleman from Michigan, [Mr. UPSON], who has been called home by sickness, refused or neglected to sign this report. It is fair to infer, therefore, that they are against it. So, then, you have four members refusing to sign it and three in favor of it. In other words, you have three Union members of the committee agreeing with the Democrats that sixteen or twenty soldiers shall be disfranchised in order to keep the sitting member in, and you have four Union members declaring that the contestant is entitled to the seat. Now, I do not consider that that makes a very strong case. Admitting that it is a majority, it is a majority of only one, and that made up of Democrats who vote on all occasions and under all circumstances that the gentleman of their party shall have the seat.

Mr. Speaker, we have been anxious that our soldiers should vote. I myself helped to pass a law giving them the right to vote. But the supreme court, being on the Democratic side, set it aside. I afterward helped to amend the constitution. We passed it through at two sessions of the Legislature and submitted it to the people. And how did the Democrats vote upon that? The returns show that 105,000 in Pennsylvania voted against it. And if I am not mistaken, the very county in which the gentleman [Mr. Dawson] lives gave a majority against that amendment. I do not believe there is a Democrat in Fayette county—and they are about as strongly impregnated with southern feeling as any other—that voted in favor of giving suffrage to the soldiers, unless it was some who had been in the Army. We labored hard to give the soldiers the right to vote, and we passed the constitutional amendment against the will of the Democrats.

Then we said to the men in the field that no technicality in the manner or count should deprive them of their votes. We did not expect the men in the field, fighting the enemy in front with their bullets, and the enemy in the rear with their ballots, could sit down and organize a board of clerks and all the paraphernalia of an election as they could do at home. Hence we provided that no informality in the law should deprive them of their votes. Now, my colleague [Mr. SCOFIELD] proved yesterday how this thing was done most conclusively. I do not say it was done unfairly. My friend from Massachusetts [Mr. DAWES] knows that no man holds him in higher regard than I do. But he is not infallible. I hold that the gentleman from Ohio [Mr. SHELLABARGER] and my colleague [Mr. SCOFIELD] each have as clear a head as he has, and they are both prepared to show to this House that if they agree to this report they disfranchise the soldiers. The committee make a long report, and they cover two pages of paper to prove that the votes of a single lot of soldiers, seven in number, in company A, one hundred and fifty-fifth regiment, ought not to be allowed.

Mr. PAINE. I merely wish to say in regard to that what I said yesterday, that of those two pages taken up in explanation of that return three fourths consists of the copy of the law of Pennsylvania, which the committee did not frame. I therefore could not well have written less.

Mr. LAWRENCE, of Pennsylvania. I am sorry the committee did not understand the laws of Pennsylvania, as it is very evident they did not. The laws of Pennsylvania were not designed to disfranchise the soldiers. And before I go further I want to say on behalf of the soldiers of Pennsylvania and other States, that in the camp, in the field, and in hospital they never voted to admit one of their enemies to this floor. I have said that this case was made up by special pleading. Let us exercise common sense. I admit I am not a lawyer, and have not looked into the technicalities of the case, perhaps, as much as some who have been educated at the bar. I am a farmer, but I claim to have some common sense, and I repeat that there is not a lawyer on this floor, I care not how astute, who can show that these figures are wrong. I will take my learned colleague, [Mr. WILLIAMS,] who has a legal reputation, perhaps, equal to any man in the State; I will give him one hour to prove that the sitting member is entitled to his seat by the facts and figures of this report, and if he can do it I will agree to vote for it. He has examined it, and so have other able lawyers in the House, and they have come to no other conclusion than that by adopting the report of the committee you disfranchise these soldiers.

Mr. DAWES. Not one.

Mr. LAWRENCE, of Pennsylvania. My friend shakes his head. I know how it will be when he comes to argue this case. I have not forgotten how he paced through these aisles when he made his argument in favor of the right of the gentleman from New York [Mr. DODGE] to his seat, and how he induced the House to set aside 200 majority there. I do not undertake to say but it was right, but I do want it understood that the dicta and the decisions of the chairman of the Committee of Elections are not always right, but that they have been overruled on former occasions. Not this session. But I say if there ever was a case where the decision of the committee ought to be overruled, it is this case. And I think if the contestant could have been here to present his own case that decision would be overruled.

And now let me show you why; and this will be the driest part of the case, of course. Company A, one hundred and fifty-fifth regiment Pennsylvania volunteers, gave Fuller 7 votes, Dawson none. But those returns are thrown out because the oaths are not attached to them. But I say the oaths are in the report, and any man can read them for himself. The majority of the committee have made a mistake, not willfully, I know, but it is a mistake, as my colleague [Mr. SCOTFIELD] showed yesterday. And the gentleman from Wisconsin [Mr. PAINE] had the frankness to admit it, and to say that these 7 votes should be counted. I take it for granted that they should be counted, for they were fairly polled in camp; and no man can show that they ought not to be counted. At Camp Parole there was 1 vote cast for Mr. Fuller; the papers are all right, all sworn to properly, and yet the vote is left out merely by negligence or oversight. I am now referring to votes that the gentleman from Wisconsin, [Mr. PAINE,] according to his theory, allows to be correct and right. And if any member desires to controvert that fact he has now an opportunity.

Now, the McClellan hospital vote is rejected by the committee, because the oaths were not properly certified on the return. Yet, in the caption of the poll-book it is set forth that the officers were sworn according to law. That is not denied, and the list of the officers is there. Yet the 3 votes from that hospital are ruled out. The majority of the committee claim that the sitting member has a majority of 15 votes. I want to show that upon their own theory the contestant, Mr. Fuller, has a majority of 16 votes.

Mr. PAINE. I understood the gentleman to say just now that the majority of the committee have found 15 majority for the sitting member.

Mr. LAWRENCE, of Pennsylvania. That is what the report says.

Mr. PAINE. Will the gentleman state in what part of the report he finds that?

Mr. LAWRENCE, of Pennsylvania. Here it is:

"Upon the hypothesis that the illegal returns, to which the contestant objected, were actually canvassed in favor of Mr. Dawson, and the notice of contest permits the contestant to attack them, the vote will be, majority for J. L. Dawson 15."

Mr. PAINE. I will explain now to the House the misunderstanding which the gentleman from Pennsylvania, [Mr. LAWRENCE,] in common with all those who take the view he does, have made in regard to this report. If he had read further he would have read:

"If it is assumed that these illegal returns were not canvassed, or that the notice of contest does not permit the contestant to attack them, Mr. Dawson's majority will be 21."

Then, turning back to page 9 of the report, he would find that there is no proof whatever in the case that those votes should have been counted; and therefore the conviction of the committee was that the majority of the sitting member was 21, and not 15.

Mr. LAWRENCE, of Pennsylvania. If the gentleman from Fayette [Mr. Dawson] was entitled to retain his seat by 21 majority, why did not the committee put it down in figures? In his argument yesterday the gentleman from Wisconsin [Mr. PAINE] claimed that the majority was 15. And when pressed by my colleague [Mr. SCOTFIELD] upon that, he now gives it up, and puts in a claim for 21 majority.

Mr. PAINE. We did not put it down in figures, but we wrote it all out in letters and words on page 12 of the report, in the very next sentence to what the gentleman read.

Mr. LAWRENCE, of Pennsylvania. I have had that page.

Mr. PAINE. Does not the gentleman find "twenty-one" there?

Mr. LAWRENCE, of Pennsylvania. Yes, I find it there. And now, if the gentleman will have patience, I will show where the other 6 votes came from. I have already shown 11 votes legally given and which should have been counted, for they were cast in camp by the soldiers under the law; and yet they have not been counted.

Then we have thus 11 votes for contestant. This return included the vote from Fayette, Indiana, and Westmoreland counties, making 15 votes in all. The committee refuse to count the 5 votes from Indiana county and the 2 votes from Fayette county, making 7 in all. Why do they refuse them? They do not deny that these votes are legal; but they object that the certificate was only from the prothonotary of Westmoreland county, and that he had no right to include in the return the votes of the other two counties. This at most is only a technical objection. The return is perfect. On page 5 of the third book will be found the evidence in regard to this matter: The return in full from the secretary of the Commonwealth of Pennsylvania was presented to the House and the committee, being numbered sixty-four. The duplicate of that return I have now here, and any member can examine it.

The certificate numbered sixty-four seems to have been lost. It is admitted that it was among the papers. The gentleman who made out the list swears that the paper was presented to the House; yet the committee by some means overlooked or lost the document; and when it was found that the return had by some means become missing, and when a duplicate had been furnished, the committee refused to count these votes. As soon as it was found that this paper was not among the papers in the hands of the committee, the contestant, or his attorney, procured from the office of the secretary of the Commonwealth, at Harrisburg, a duplicate copy of the return, with the seal of the State attached, accompanied with the affidavit of the proper officer; yet those 7 votes were not counted. Why? Not because the evidence was not furnished to the committee, for they admit they had it; yet they refuse to count these 7 votes. Adding these 7 to the 11, which I have already shown should be counted, make 18—3 more than the majority claimed for Mr. Dawson in the report.

Now, let us turn to the vote of the two hundred and sixth regiment in the field. In that case we have evidence that the officers conducting the elections were sworn. Yet the committee refuse to count the votes because, they allege, the officers were not "sufficiently" sworn. It is set forth in the caption of the poll-book that the officers were sworn, and the oath is given, signed by all the officers, showing that the officers were regularly sworn, and that they conducted the election regularly. Yet the vote thus returned is ruled out and disregarded. These votes would have made 2 more for the contestant. There is no reason why these votes should not have been counted. The law provides that the soldiers' votes shall not be ruled out on account of any technicality or informality. It was expressly intended by the Legislature that considerable latitude should be allowed for irregularities in the elections by soldiers in the field; that their votes should not be nullified on account of any informality. The 2 votes returned from this regiment would make 20 for the contestant.

In the fourth independent artillery there were 4 votes cast. The committee make the same objection to these votes. Yet, in the caption of the poll-book it is set out that the officers were all severally sworn according to law previous to their receiving any of the votes. Here are 4 more votes which the committee refuse to count, although it was admitted that they were polled, as is certified by the oaths of the officers. It is true there may be some informalities; but does the gentleman from Wisconsin, who has himself served so faithfully in the field, and who bears honorable scars, does he stand up in this case and declare that our Pennsylvania soldiers shall be disfranchised because some clerk has not included in the return every word that should have been inserted? It is admitted that the returns may be informal to a certain extent; but they are legally sworn to, and they are the very same class of returns upon which the majority have based their report in favor of the sitting member. Now, this makes 24 votes that Mr. Fuller is entitled to free of all doubt. I have shown this House, I think, that these 24 votes should have been counted for the contestant in this case.

But I have more here of the same kind. Take Satterlee hospital. It is proved that of 6 votes cast there 5 were cast for Fuller and 1 for Dawson; that will give Fuller 29 majority. Yet notwithstanding the evidence of the votes cast in these hospitals where the majority was largely in favor of the contestant and against the sitting member, making the majority of the contestant 29, we have here three members of the Republican party declaring to the world that the law of Pennsylvania is to be trampled under foot and the soldiers of that State are to be disfranchised. Now, will this House do this injustice to these soldiers after they had done so much for the country? I would like to see gentlemen go into their districts and defend themselves when they will throw out soldiers' votes because there has been some informality. But, sir, there has been no informality in one case that has not existed in the other. I think the facts will prove incontestably that my declaration is true.

Mr. Speaker, one word more and I will close. I know how hard it is to meet the report of the Committee of Elections or any other committee. I can call to mind several cases where the House by an overwhelming vote has refused to pass a bill reported by the committee. I may refer to the case of a bill reported by the chairman of the Committee on Military Affairs, one of the ablest members of the House, which was rejected by the House. It is no disrespect to the Committee of Elections when I say that four members of that committee, equal in intelligence, equal in discrimination to those of the majority, refused to sign the report. I know how members upon this floor have been button-holed to go for the sitting member in this case. I know how personal appeals have been made to stand by the sitting member. I have noticed it, and whether honorable or not, I leave it to the friends of the sitting member to determine.

Mr. ROSS. As the other side have more than sufficient majority to pass laws over the President's veto, I do not see that there is any political reason why they should turn out any more members on this side. We have now only members enough to call the yeas and nays, and I ask why the gentleman will not let us remain as we are.

Mr. LAWRENCE, of Pennsylvania. I am glad the gentleman has put the question in that way. I say those gentlemen have treated the soldiers' vote with reproach and contumely. They have tried in every possible way to disfranchise them. Still, if any member is legally elected, I am in favor of giving him his seat. I admit that I have been in the habit of voting with the committee, although I do not know that their recommendation was always right.

Mr. ROSS. Did you not vote with the committee to turn out some members on this side who were entitled to their seats?

Mr. LAWRENCE, of Pennsylvania. The gentleman asks me whether I did not vote to turn out some members on that side who were entitled to their seats. I will say that none were turned out who were not turned out by the judgment of the committee; but some have been retained who ought not to have been retained, because I do not believe they were elected by the people. I know the power of personal influence. It is very easy for me to go and ask an old friend to stand by me. It is not very difficult to get a member who has not examined the question to say he will not vote to turn out a member with whom he is acquainted. Knowing what an effort has been made to keep out the soldiers' vote, believing the committee has come to a wrong conclusion, knowing that four members of the committee refuse to sign the report, I leave the case to the House with the hope that the House will do justice to this contestant.

I have much more which I would like to say but which I am precluded from saying by want of time. The contestant presented his case fully to the committee, and if the House will examine it I am sure they will agree with me that it is unanswerable.

Mr. MILLER obtained the floor.

Mr. MARSHALL. If the gentleman will permit me, I would like to say a few words in response to a remark made by his colleague, [Mr. LAWRENCE.]

Mr. MILLER. I will yield to the gentleman if it does not come out of my time.

The SPEAKER. It will not come out of the gentleman's time.

Mr. MILLER. Then I have no objection to yielding.

Mr. MARSHALL. I do not propose to discuss the merits of the question now before the House. It is in the hands of gentlemen who have studied it more thoroughly than I have, and are able to do justice to the report of the committee, and I should not have said a word had it not been for a remark that I was very much surprised to hear fall from the lips of the gentleman who has just taken his seat, and that remark, I think, was unworthy of him and unworthy of his position as a member of this House.

Mr. Speaker, I have listened here during a long session to a great many discourteous remarks made by gentlemen of the majority toward the minority on this floor. It has been the daily practice for gentlemen upon the other side of the House to sneer at the motives of gentlemen of the minority, and to speak of us as if we were not governed by the ordinary motives which actuate gentlemen and legislators acting upon their oaths and with all the responsibilities of their position resting upon them. It has been deemed a sufficient answer to any arguments that might be made from this side of the House that they came from Democrats, and the sneer "secessionists," "copper-heads," "traitors," "sympathizers with the rebellion," and the like, have been deemed a conclusive and overwhelming answer to any arguments.

Now, I wish to say right here that gentlemen who cannot discuss the principles of a measure without attacking the motives and character of those who happen to disagree with them are unworthy of seats in a great deliberative body like this. It is disgraceful to the House and disgraceful to the country that great measures cannot be discussed here by gentlemen without impugning the motives and the character of gentlemen who happen to differ from those who are discussing those measures. When these general slings have been made against this side of the House, however unjust or discourteous, I have not been disposed to mingle in the debates, or to attempt to reprove those guilty of conduct which I think disgraceful to the country. But I understood the gentleman from Pennsylvania, [Mr. LAWRENCE,] whom I have regarded with great respect to say that the majority report in this case was made up by the concurrent votes of two gentlemen of the Democratic party, and that without their votes there would have been no majority in favor of the sitting member in this case, and that those gentlemen of the Democratic party would vote for a member of their own party without any regard whatever to the merits of the case.

Mr. LAWRENCE, of Pennsylvania. Will the gentleman allow me to explain? He has certainly misunderstood me.

Mr. MARSHALL. Of course I will.

Mr. LAWRENCE, of Pennsylvania. I desire to repeat what I did state. I said this: that the gentleman from Wisconsin who made this report spent half an hour in attempting to prove that this report was the report of a majority of the committee. I admitted that it was the report of the committee, but I said that the Democratic members of the committee had, during this session, voted uniformly on all occasions for their own friends. The gentleman from Illinois knows that there is no gentleman upon the other side of the House for whom I have a higher regard than I have for him, but I ask him if my statement is not true.

Mr. MARSHALL. You are mistaken in regard to that.

Mr. LAWRENCE, of Pennsylvania. If I am mistaken, I stand corrected; but I understand that in the Voorhees case the Democratic members of the committee voted to sustain Mr. Voorhees.

Mr. MARSHALL. Yes, sir; they did.

Mr. LAWRENCE, of Pennsylvania. In the Dodge case, did they not vote to sustain Mr. Brooks?

Mr. MARSHALL. Yes, sir.

Mr. LAWRENCE, of Pennsylvania. In the case of Koontz vs. Coffroth, you sustained Coffroth.

Mr. MARSHALL. In those three cases you are right and we were right.

Mr. LAWRENCE, of Pennsylvania. In the case of Fuller against Dawson, they voted to sustain Mr. Dawson.

Mr. MARSHALL. Yes, sir.

Mr. LAWRENCE, of Pennsylvania. In the case of Mr. Baldwin, of Michigan, they voted for Mr. Baldwin, although there was a majority of five or six hundred for Mr. Trowbridge.

Mr. MARSHALL. I remind the gentleman of the case of Follett against Delano.

Mr. LAWRENCE, of Pennsylvania. Oh, there was no real contest in that case. I want the gentleman to understand that I have no personal feeling toward him. I am only stating facts.

Mr. MARSHALL. I do not understand the gentleman yet to say that he did not make the remark which I understood him to have made, that we would vote for our own side without any regard to the merits of the case. What I intended to say was that this mode of discussing questions, so frequently indulged in by gentlemen, by attacking the motives and character of those who happen to differ from them, is illegitimate and disgraceful to the House and the country.

Mr. LAWRENCE, of Pennsylvania. If the gentleman will have it so I cannot help it. If they will vote so they must bear the blame.

Mr. MARSHALL. That is no answer to what I have said. I said, and I repeat it, that this mode of discussion, which has been adopted to a great extent by gentlemen upon the other side of the House during this session, is disreputable to the House and the country, and for myself, personally, I do not intend to submit to it any longer.

Now, I would not have made these remarks had not the gentleman alluded personally to myself, because I happen to be a member of the Committee of Elections. And I wish to say that while I do not claim to be free from the imperfections of human nature, while I know that all men are sometimes unconsciously misled in their judgments by their preconceived ideas or predilections, when any gentleman imputes to me motives other than those which ought to actuate a gentleman and a legislator under the high responsibility of his oath and his position, he does that which is unworthy of him and he makes a charge which is in fact false.

Mr. LAWRENCE, of Pennsylvania. Mr. Speaker, I will not bandy words with my friend on the other side of the House. He knows that I have a high personal respect for him, as much as I have for any member of the Democratic party. The gentleman will admit that he has been so long associated with that party that it would be difficult for him to differ with them in opinion. I do not say that he does these things dishonestly at all—not by any means. I have simply stated facts. Let the gentleman explain the facts away and not abuse me.

SUFFERERS BY THE PORTLAND FIRE.

A message from the Senate, by Mr. FORNEY, its Secretary, announced that the Senate had passed a joint resolution (S. R. No. 129) to authorize the President to place at the disposal of the authorities of Portland, Maine, tents, camp and hospital furniture, and clothing for the use of families rendered houseless by the late fire, in which he was directed to ask the concurrence of the House.

Mr. RICE, of Maine. I ask unanimous consent to take up the joint resolution which has just been received and put it on its passage.

No objection being made, the joint resolution was read a first, second, and third time, and passed.

Mr. RICE, of Maine, moved to reconsider the vote by which the joint resolution was passed; and also moved that the motion to reconsider be laid upon the table.

The latter motion was agreed to.

LEAVE OF ABSENCE.

Mr. MOULTON asked and obtained leave of absence for the remainder of the session for his colleague, Mr. CULLOM.

ELECTION CONTEST—AGAIN.

Mr. MILLER. Mr. Speaker, I consider this case one of very great importance, not only to our State but to the whole United States. In 1790 a constitution was adopted by the State of Pennsylvania, and on the 29th of March, 1813, an act of Assembly was passed under that constitution giving to soldiers in the field the right to vote. No person ever questioned the constitutionality of that act, nobody ever doubted it. And that law remained undisturbed until 1838.

In 1837 a convention was called in the State of Pennsylvania for the purpose of forming a new constitution, and in 1838 that new constitution was adopted. In framing that constitution a few words were changed from what they were in that of 1790. On the 2d of July, 1839, a law was passed by the Legislative Assembly of Pennsylvania and approved by the Governor, by which citizens of that State who were soldiers in the Army of the United States were allowed to exercise the right of the elective franchise, notwithstanding they might at the time be outside of the State. That law remained undisturbed, no one doubting its constitutionality or making any objection to it until 1861.

When the soldiers of the State were called out to defend the country and to put down the rebellion, under the provision of the statute of their State of the 2d of July, 1839, though far from their homes and in the face of the enemy, they undertook to exercise the elective franchise in the same manner as they might have if done at their respective homes, but when those votes were returned the candidates against whom they were cast attacked them on the ground that they had not any right to vote, being out of the State and not within the district in which they claimed a right to vote when at home.

It finally came before the supreme court of Pennsylvania in the case of Chase vs. Miller, (5 Wright, page 403,) and by a majority the court in that case, after argument by able counsel, decided that the forty-third section of the election law of Pennsylvania, passed July 2, 1839, allowing citizens in actual military service to vote outside of the boundaries of the State, conflicts with the amended clause of the third article of the constitution, and is therefore unconstitutional, and consequently null and void; and therefore the soldiers' votes were thrown out and not allowed to be counted.

Now, under the constitution of Pennsylvania, amendments can be proposed to the constitution in this way: they are first submitted to a Legislature, and if approved by a majority of both Houses by yeas and nays duly entered of record, are then to be published in the papers for three months preceding the next general election for members of the Legislature. Then the amendments are submitted to the second Legislature, and if passed in a similar manner by both Houses, they are submitted to a vote of the people upon a like notice given. And if they are ratified by a majority of the voters they become part and parcel of the constitution of the State.

An amendment to the constitution was finally adopted in 1864, giving to soldiers in the service a right to vote, thus overruling the decision of the supreme court of our State. Under this amendment a law was passed on the 25th of August, 1864, fixing the mode and manner in which the soldiers in the field were allowed to exercise the right of voting.

Then, in pursuance of that law, election papers were sent to the soldiers in the field, and they proceeded to vote, and the question now is as to who is legally entitled to a seat upon this floor as the Representative from the twenty-first congressional district of the State of Pennsylvania, whether Dr. Smith Fuller, the contestant, or Hon. John L. Dawson, the sitting member. Sir, I will undertake to show by the record that it is as clear as daylight that Dr. Smith Fuller has a majority of the legal votes cast and is rightfully entitled to a seat in this House.

I have nothing to say against the sitting member or about political parties. This is a question not of party, but of law and fact. It has been alleged by the gentleman from Wisconsin [Mr. PAINE] that the returns were imperfect. By the law of Pennsylvania these directions are merely formal. In the fifteenth section of the act of 25th August, 1864, the language used as to forms is that the following shall be substantially the form of the poll-books, thus showing that no particular form of return, &c., is required; and besides, the uniform decisions of the State courts in all these election matters are, that the intention of the law is to ascertain the truth as to the votes polled, so that the voice of the people, as expressed at the ballot-box, shall be respected and allowed to have full force. I will show further, by the decisions of the highest courts of the country, that an oath is not necessary where there is other sufficient legal evidence.

Now, Mr. Speaker, let us examine for a few moments the facts of this case. In the first place, we find that in company A, one hundred and fifty-fifth regiment, 7 votes were cast for the contestant. What objection is made to counting those votes? The objection urged by the honorable gentleman from Wisconsin is, in the first place, that the poll-book was absent; and in the second place, that the oaths are not certified. Now, sir, by reference to the books, it is shown that everything is here that is required. On pages 59, 60, and 61 of Document No. 2, containing the testimony in this case, I find the oaths all set out, and a certificate signed by the judges and the clerks, and stating that they were sworn, and which read as follows:

JOHN ZIMMERMAN,
Prothonotary.

Let me say here, that these technical objections which the gentleman from Wisconsin seeks to raise have no bearing upon the case according to the law as enacted and construed in Pennsylvania. In that State we do not regard technicalities in a case of this sort. It is not expected that our citizens, when in the Army, will be able to comply strictly with all the legal formalities as may be done in an election at home, where we have experienced clerks. We have a clear statute regulating elections by the soldiers, and declaring that no informality shall defeat the expression of their will.

Rut, Mr. Speaker, proceeding further, we have the return from McClellan hospital, embracing 3 votes for the contestant. On pages 6, 7, 380, and 381 we find the poll-book of the election, and which reads thus:

For Representative in the House of Representatives of the United States, Smith Fuller, Westmoreland county, had (3) three votes; Smith Fuller, Indiana county, had (3) three votes.

Here we have the record, showing that contestant received 3 votes in McClellan hospital. We have the return set forth almost word for word in the terms prescribed by the statute, though, as I shall show, those forms are merely directory.

Then we have the vote cast in Camp Parole. The return is given in full, showing 1 vote for the contestant, the record of which is in the hands of the committee, properly certified, supported by the oaths; so that there can be no mistake about the correctness of this vote. Thus far we have for the contestant 11 votes beyond all question.

Then we come to the vote returned from camp in the field, two hundred and sixth regiment. Here we find 2 votes cast for the contestant. On page 5 of the third book we find the return, which is as follows:

[No 43.]

Poll-book of the election held on the second Tuesday of October, in the year 1864, by the qualified voters of Westmoreland county, State of Pennsylvania, being in the actual military service under the requisition of the President of the United States, in the field and staff of the two hundred and sixth regiment Pennsylvania volunteers, held at camp in the field, Virginia, Army of the James; Hugh J. Brady, T. M. Laney, and J. L. Crawford being duly elected judges of the election, and John Lowry and Milton Shields being duly appointed clerks of said election, and being all severally sworn according to the certificates herewith returned.

We, Hugh J. Brady, T. M. Laney, and J. L. Crawford, judges of this election, and we, John Lowry and Milton Shields, clerks thereof, do each severally swear that we will duly perform the duties of judges and clerks of the said election, severally acting as set forth in the act of the General Assembly of Pennsylvania, entitled "An act regulating elections by soldiers in actual military service," according to law and to the best of our abilities, and that we will studiously endeavor to prevent fraud, deceit, or abuse in conducting the same.

Thus in this case the requirement with reference to the oath is substantially complied with. Let me remark, however, in speaking of this part of the case, that it is not necessary that the election officers should sign an oath. If it be stated in the body of the papers, that they were sworn it is the same as a jurat. If the record shows that they were regularly sworn it is not material that the return should include the form of the oath with their signatures attached. That may be required by the law of Wisconsin, but such is not the law of Pennsylvania. It never has been and never will be.

Now, sir, taking the votes returned from camp in the field, two hundred and sixth regiment, we have 13 votes substantially proved for the contestant beyond all cavil. Then we come to battery H, fourth independent artillery, where 4 votes were cast for the contestant. If you look to page 28, of the third book, you will find that the return is regularly signed by all the officers of the election, and that in the caption it states that the officers holding the election were all duly sworn, which return is as follows:

Poll-Book.

At an election held at Seward light artillery barracks, Alexandria, Virginia, of the voters of Westmoreland county, State of Pennsylvania, of battery "H," independent Pennsylvania artillery, on the second Tuesday of October, 1864, Lieutenant William H. Askin and Sergeants John A. Floyd and John M. McGratty were duly elected judges of said election, and Corporal John J. Case and Private James L. Sutherland were appointed as clerks, and all being severally sworn according to law previous to receiving any of the votes. The following are the names of the persons voting and number of the votes cast:

David Jenkins, North Huntingdon township; Thomas Fouks, North Huntingdon township; Christopher Gordon, North Huntingdon township; John Fry, North Huntingdon township.

For Representative in the House of Representatives of the United States, Smith Fuller had four votes, (4) whole number of votes cast, four, (4).

For prothonotary, James Freeman had four votes, (4) whole number of votes cast, four, (4).

For representatives in the House of Representatives of the State of Pennsylvania, James McAfee had three, (3) whole number of votes cast, three, (3). James McElroy had three votes (3) whole number of votes cast, three, (3). George E. Smith had three votes, (3); the whole number of votes cast, three, (3).

For clerk of quarter sessions,oyer and terminor, and orphans' court, J. C. Gamble had four votes, (4) whole number of votes cast, four, (4).

We, Lieutenant William H. Askin, Jr., and Sergeants John A. Floyd and John M. McGratty, judges of said election, and Corporal John J. Case and Private James L. Sutherland, clerks thereof, hereby certify that the foregoing is a just and correct poll of all the votes cast.

[L. S.] GEORGE BENNETT,
Prothonotary.

Westmoreland County, ss:

I, John Zimmerman, prothonotary of the court of common pleas of the county of Westmoreland, in the Commonwealth of Pennsylvania, do certify that the foregoing is a full and correct copy of the poll-book, &c., held by persons in the military service at the time and place stated in the caption of the original as of file in my office, rejected by return judges; and I further certify that the reason assigned for the rejection of said return was on account of the officers not being sworn.

In witness whereof, I have hereunto set my hand and affixed the seal of said court, at Greensburg, this 12th day of May, A. D. 1866.

JOHN ZIMMERMAN,
Prothonotary.

This makes 17 legal votes for the contestant, even taking the construction of the law laid down by the learned gentleman from Wisconsin, [Mr. PAINE.] Then taking the 15 votes put down by the majority of the committee for the sitting member, it still leaves a majority of 2 for Smith Fuller, the contestant. But we do not stop here. There is the Lincoln hospital, which gives 15 votes for Fuller, 8 of which are counted and the balance rejected. Why is this? The committee say they rejected them because the record from Harrisburg has been mislaid or lost, but do not dispute but that it had been before them. When it was discovered on the part of the contestant that the copy from the records at Harrisburg was missing, he sent to the Governor of Pennsylvania and received from the secretary of state a duplicate of the return, which I have here, under the broad seal of that State in due form. Would it be just that the contestant and his constituents should suffer in consequence of the committee losing some of his papers? The learned gentleman from Wisconsin does not now seriously object to the certified copy under the broad seal of the State of Pennsylvania in due form.

They say, however, that it was objected to on another ground, to wit, that these 7 votes would probably have been thrown out because they were returned to Westmoreland instead of the counties of Indiana and Fayette, where they belong. But that was no substantial reason for rejecting them. Wherever the soldiers polled those votes they could have been returned to the proper places. The statutes required that the votes should be sent to the proper county, and also to the secretary of the Commonwealth, under the provisions of the seventeenth section of said act, which is as follows:

"Sec. 17. After canvassing the votes, in manner aforesaid, the judges shall put in an envelope one of the poll-books, with its tally-list, and return of each city or county, together with the tickets, and transmit the same, properly sealed up and directed, through the nearest post office, or by express, as soon as possible thereafter, to the prothonotary of the court of common pleas of the city or county in which such electors would have voted if not in the military service aforesaid, (being the city or county for which the poll-book was kept,) and the other poll-book of said city or county, enclosed in an envelope, and sealed as aforesaid, and properly directed, shall be delivered to one of the commissioners hereinafter provided for, if such commissioner calls for the same in ten days, and if not so called for the same shall be transmitted by mail or by express as soon as possible thereafter, to the secretary of the Commonwealth, who shall carefully preserve the same, and on demand of the proper prothonotary deliver to said prothonotary, under his hand and official seal, a certified copy of the return of votes so transmitted to and received by him, for said city or county, of which the defendant is prothonotary."

The return was sent to the secretary of the Commonwealth in pursuance of the statute showing that there were 7 votes in this county passed for Smith Fuller, as the certified copy of record in due form of law, which I hold in my hand, shows. I ask the gentleman who threw out in his count the 7 votes, under what rule of law or justice he did so, and on what principle he deprived those soldiers of one of their dearest rights? But we do not stop here. Suppose we take the say-so of the gentleman from Wisconsin that the sitting member had 21 votes. Take 21 from 24 and still Smith Fuller has 3 majority.

We come now to the Satterlee hospital vote. Six votes were cast for Smith Fuller and one for Dawson. Let us look at the record on pages 336, 337, 338, and 218 of second book. It shows the names of all those who voted, and according to the doctrine of the gentleman from Wisconsin, they ought to have been counted. Here is the record, and I ask all the members of this House whether these votes ought to have been thrown out. On page 338 we have clear proof that they ought to have been counted.

It is objected by the gentleman that there is no return because it is signed by the clerks instead of by others; but that is substantial compliance with the Pennsylvania statute. The pages 336, 337, 338, and 218 read as follows:

Return of the Election.

At an election held on the second Tuesday of October, A. D. 1864, the qualified electors of Fayette County, State of Pennsylvania, being in the actual military service aforesaid, and unable to attend any company poll, or their proper place of election at Carver hospital, being the place selected by the said electors for opening the poll for this election, there were cast—

OFFICE SECRETARY OF THE COMMONWEALTH,
HARRISBURG, March 31, 1866.

Pennsylvania, ss:

I do hereby certify that the foregoing is a correct copy of the return of an election held on the second Tuesday of October, in the year 1864, at Camp Hamilton, near Fort Monroe, Virginia, as the same remains on file in this office, so far as relates to the vote for Congress in the county of Fayette.

In witness whereof, I have hereunto set my hand and caused the seal of said office to be affixed, this 31st day of March, A. D. 1866.

ELI SLIFER,
Secretary of the Commonwealth.

We have now a majority of 17 votes for Smith Fuller, the contestant. The record, therefore, shows beyond all question that he is clearly elected.

Now as to the formality. Let me refer to the law of 1864 to which I have already adverted, the twenty-seventh section of which is as follows:

"Sec. 27. No mere informality in the manner of carrying out or executing any of the provisions of this act shall invalidate any election held under the same, or authorize the return thereof to be rejected or set aside; nor shall any failure on the part of the commissioners to reach or visit any regiment or company, or part of company, or the failure of any company or part of company to vote, invalidate any election which may be held under this act."

This section was put in just to prevent those who want to stop or stifle the voice of the people. We expected there would be no caviling or trouble after the amendment of the constitution was adopted, but we were mistaken, and it was thought by the passage of the act of August 25, 1864, with this section it would be a quietus to all those who were opposed to the soldiers' vote.

Then in regard to the other part of the statute, providing that it shall be substantially a certain form, we fixed the form for them to follow, but it was merely to guide the election officers in the field as to some form. Hence the law declared that it should be substantially this form. Nobody thought that that would be attempted to be set aside if the form and the act should not be followed.

I will now refer to a few cases in point. In a contested-election case in the city of Philadelphia, (2 Phil. Rep., page 244,) the learned judge who delivered the opinion says:

"It has been properly held that mere irregularities, when there is no reason to infer that the election officers have acted in bad faith, will not invalidate the returns. (Boileau's case, 2 Parsons, 503.) Nor will the mere neglect of directory requirements produce that effect."

It is essential, however, that evidence of so great importance should exhibit those marks of care in its preparation, without which it may be rendered less efficient or entirely unreliable. Utter disregard of the requirements of the law, in the recording of votes, or in the preparation of the returns, amounting to strong evidence of bad faith upon the part of the officers, ought to, and will have the effect of destroying such returns as evidence."

Further on the court uses this language:

"We will not become parties to such a system, and the only rule we can consent to adopt is the plain one, already stated, that where honesty and integrity are apparent mere omissions will be disregarded, but gross acts of negligence and apparent frauds will at any stage of a case be regarded as the proper subjects of the closest investigation. If this be not determining a case upon its merits, we have mistaken the meaning of that term."

Now, in this case there is no allegation of fraud, but a mere objection on the ground of an alleged informal return, and that in consequence of such informality the terms of the statute were not complied with. If those voters had been at home they would have had a clear right to vote, and surely this flimsy objection ought not to prevail to deprive them of that right when in the field in defense of their country.

But I go further; I cite the case of the People vs. Cook, in the supreme court of New York, (14 Barber, 285,) in which the court says:

"It becomes important, in this case, to determine whether the objections which are taken to the inspectors of elections in the several cases presented in this bill of exceptions are of that character which should be held to invalidate the canvass in these several localities. These objections are of a twofold character, extending to the regularity or legality of their appointment, and of their omission to qualify, by taking the proper oath of office. I will not stop to inquire whether these inspectors, in these several cases, were inspectors de jure or not. It is sufficient that they were inspectors de facto."

On page 287, Judge Mason, of New York, says:

"The same rule was applied to the commissioners of highways, who had omitted to take the oath of office in the case of the People vs. Covert, (1 Hill 674;) and the same rule was applied to a constable in the case of the People vs. Hopson, (1 Denis 575;) and in the matter of the election of directors of the Mohawk and Hudson Railroad Company, (19 Went. 135,) the doctrine was applied to inspectors of elections; where it was expressly held that being officers de facto, their omission to take the oath prescribed by the statute did not invalidate the election. This disposes of the question of the oath in regard to these inspectors, as well as the clerks of the board; and the only and remaining question is, whether these inspectors are to be regarded as officers de facto, acting under color of legal authority."

In the same case, page 311, will be found the following:

"I cannot but think, however, that to hold that the omissions of these officers, through negligence, mistakes, or other inadvertence, to comply with all these directions of the statute, should have the effect to disfranchise the electors, would be unjust in the extreme, and, indeed, subversive of the fundamental principles of our Government. I think that the only sensible rule upon this subject is not to permit such omissions, whether they are the result of negligence, ignorance, mistake, or fraud, to invalidate the election, whenever, by going behind the returns, the canvass, or even the ballot-boxes, the true state of the canvass or ballot can be obtained, and the expressed will of the electors ascertained; and the cases in this court have already gone this length."

Still further, on page 325, is the following:

"No one will doubt the importance of a rigid adherence to all the provisions of the statute regulating elections; nor will any one doubt that it is more important to ascertain the true result of the votes cast. To vote is a right secured by a paramount law, and lies at the foundation of our Government; while the statute was intended simply to regulate the conduct of those who receive, canvass, and make returns of the votes, for the benefit of those upon whom the right to vote has been conferred, unrestricted as to form, except that it shall be by ballot. If a strict adherence to the directions of the statute are indispensable to the validity of an election, and they are not complied with, the penalty falls upon the voter, notwithstanding the exact result has been ascertained, and that, too, through the medium of officers who, so far as the public and third persons are concerned, would make the regulation more important than the right—the statute and not the constitution the paramount law—and would result so far as concerns the election at which the statute directions have not been obeyed, either through the ignorance, carelessness, or design of the officers of elections, in a virtual disfranchisement of those upon whom the right to vote has been conferred, except in those cases where power is conferred to vacate an election, and restore the electors to their original rights. We have no such power. The result of an election, when controverted in court, is like a judgment sued upon."

Then further, on page 327:

"In 1830 a contest arose out of an election in Tennessee, where by the statute each ticket was required to be put in a box, to be locked up or otherwise well secured; the place made in the box for the reception of tickets to be sealed at the close of the polls, when the inspectors were to take charge of it and keep it until the next day, when the seal was to be removed. Upon an investigation, upon the petition of Arnold, contesting the seat of Sea, it appeared that in one portion of the district out of which the contest arose, a gourd instead of a box was used for the reception of tickets, which, at the close of the polls, was tied up in a handkerchief. In another portion of the district the inspectors of election were not sworn, and in another the ballot-box was not kept over night by an inspector but by a blind man, who locked it in a desk and kept it there over night. The committee to whom the petition was referred were of opinion that the omission by the inspectors to be sworn did not vitiate the election; and that, notwithstanding the irregularities in conducting the election, it had been conducted fairly and honestly; and that the seat of Sea ought not, therefore, to be vacated. A resolution to that effect was adopted by the House. (Contested Elections in Congress, 601, 602, 604, 605.) The principle adopted in each of these cases is sustained by one clearly implied in that of Bronson, J., in the case of the People vs. Vail, (20 Wend. 14,) where he repels the idea that the will of the electors, plainly expressed in the forms prescribed by law, can be defeated by the negligence, mistake, or fraud of the officers appointed to register the result of an election. And in the case of Strong, petitioner, (20 Rich. 491, 492,) Morton, J., says: 'It would be more in consonance with the spirit of our institutions, to inflict severe punishment upon the misconduct, intentional or accidental, of the officers, but to receive the votes, whenever they can be ascertained with reasonable certainty.' Upon principle, therefore, fortified by the opinions of experienced and learned judges of courts of justice, a departure, by the inspectors of elections or clerks of the polls, from the statute directing the manner of conducting elections, whether it be attributable to ignorance, negligence, or fraudulent design, cannot deprive the electors of their right, secured by a paramount law, unless one or more of the causes has rendered it impossible to ascertain the result with reasonable certainty."

I will refer to report of an election in Pennsylvania in 1865, in which the same question came up in regard to these soldiers. On page 9 of the report it says:

"Your committee is of opinion that the command of the twenty-seventh section of the act of 1864 speaks to all the tribunals before which such returns of soldiers' votes may come. It is a positive command to prothonotaries in certifying to returns. It is a like command to county return judges; also to district return judges. To courts on the trial of contested elections; to the clerk of the House in making out his roll of members; to the House in admitting them to seats; and to committees selected to try contested elections. No informality, or even bad faith, on the part of any one of these tribunals in rejecting soldiers' votes would bind the next tribunal before whom they might come. The effort of two district judges to throw out soldiers' votes enough to change the result of the election in any district could have no binding force upon the clerk of the House or upon the House itself. These judges were not acting within the scope of their legitimate authority. Their omission to sign the true return was but an informality, which the law expressly declares shall not vitiate. It is scarcely necessary to add that Messrs. Meyers and Finley never contested the seat awarded by the House to Messrs. Armstrong and Ross."

And on pages 11 and 12, I read the following:

"Your committee also called before them citizens of Westmoreland county, to whose testimony the attention of the House is invited. The prothonotary of that county pursued a different, but equally as extraordinary and illegal a course as the prothonotaries of the counties of Bedford and Adams. He declined to certify a copy of the return of votes from and by the soldiers, as directed by the act of 1864, but sent before the return judges the returns themselves. The said prothonotary was proven, before your committee, to have had an interview and understanding with certain attorneys of the town of Greensburg, one of whom was a return judge himself, and became the president of the board on their assembling. The evidence shows that, under the direction of this president, some twenty-two returns of votes from the soldiers in the field were thrown out, and that for mere informalities, specially provided for in said act of 1864. The evidence further shows a combination and party arrangement to reject said returns, and further shows that through some management the minority of the judges were induced to sign the necessary certificates, before the result had been ascertained, or before any action or decision was had on any question relating to said returns. This action, the minority of said judges had no doubt afterward of being a designed trick and advantage taken of them, and your committee may add that they have no doubt of the same.

"Upon a careful review of all the facts developed by the examination of the committee, we have concluded that further legislation is necessary, to protect the soldier in the exercise of the elective franchise. Your committee report herewith a bill which, in their judgment, is calculated to secure the end contemplated by their appointment. The people of the State have, as we believe, a high regard and sacred respect for the doctrine that the will of the majority shall be the law of the land. It must not be permitted that the confidence and respect always manifested by the people toward the decision of the majority at the ballot-box, shall ever be shaken, much less destroyed. There could be no more speedy method devised for the overthrow of our institutions than the adoption of a system which should convince the people that their voice, fairly expressed at the ballot-box, should be set aside by the tricks, frauds, or conspiracies of a few prothonotaries and return judges."

In summing up the votes, we have clearly 24 votes cast substantially in the form prescribed by the statute. Taking the 15 from the 24 leaves 9 majority in favor of the contestant. But suppose you allow 21, which is the highest number the committee take; that would leave 3 majority for the contestant. But, counting the whole number of votes clearly cast, there are 32. Take 21 from 32 and it leaves 11 majority. Or take 15 from 32 and you have 17 majority. So any way you please to take it there is a clear majority in favor of the contestant.

Now, I do not pretend to say that party has anything to do with this. I have not a word to say about party. We are, as I have already said, on higher ground than that. We found our claim upon the law and the facts. In Pennsylvania, instead of keeping our brave boys at home we sent them to the battle-field, and there, in the face of the enemy, we allowed them to vote. And they voted to elect members of Congress who would vote for laws to sustain them in the field while fighting for their country. Now, the question is, shall those votes be rejected by us? There is no evidence or allegation of fraud; nothing of the kind. They were lawful voters and deposited their ballots in good faith, and the question for the House is whether the little technicalities and informalities of which the gentleman from Wisconsin [Mr. PAINE] has said so much, shall deprive them of their votes. Is the Congress of the United States to require that every t must be crossed and every i be dotted and every comma put in the returns, or else the soldiers' vote shall be rejected? If that is so, then the law is but a dead letter so far as its intent and purpose is concerned.

I trust the House will take this matter into consideration, and not, because a majority of a committee have reported a particular way, go with the committee. I have heard the argument used here again and again, "Go with the committee," "Go with the committee." That is a strange argument. Is a committee of but nine members to rule the action of the Congress of the United States? For what is a committee appointed? To prepare business and report it to the House; and then the House is to decide whether the recommendation of the committee is right or wrong. If the committee is to decide all things, then Congress better go home and let the committee decide all these matters for us. I repudiate any such doctrine as that. I say this honorable committee, however fairly and honorably they may have acted, have been mistaken in regard to the law and disregarded the facts.

I have undertaken to show by the law that they were wrong. And now I appeal to the House and ask them if they will vote to keep the sitting member in his seat merely because he is a fine and clever man, and deny to the people of that congressional district the Representative for whom they voted as their choice? I aver that according to the law and according to the facts Mr. Fuller is clearly elected, and I ask that he be allowed to take his seat. I do not ask it upon party grounds, because we have nothing to do with party in this matter. I claim it because the facts and the law are in favor of Mr. Fuller, and it is due to the electors of the twenty-first district of Pennsylvania that they should be represented in Congress by the man of their choice.

If you decide against the right of Mr. Fuller to the seat here, you decide virtually that the soldiers in the field shall not be allowed to vote, and that the men who periled their lives to save our country in her struggle shall be deprived of one of their most sacred rights. I do not believe that any lawyer upon this floor, or any member of this House, who has examined this case thoroughly, will hesitate a moment to say that the contestant is entitled to a seat here, and will so vote. And with these remarks I leave the question to be decided by the House.

Mr. DAWES obtained the floor.

Mr. GARFIELD. Will the gentleman yield to me for a moment?

Mr. DAWES. Certainly.

DEATHS OF PRISONERS OF WAR.

Mr. GARFIELD, by unanimous consent, submitted the following resolution; which was read, considered, and agreed to:

Resolved, That the Secretary of War be directed to report to this House, at as early a day as possible, the whole number of Union soldiers who died during the war while held by the rebels as prisoners of war, and also the number of rebel soldiers who died while held by us as prisoners of war.

Mr. GARFIELD moved to reconsider the vote by which the resolution was agreed to; and also moved that the motion to reconsider be laid on the table.

The latter motion was agreed to.

ENROLLED JOINT RESOLUTION SIGNED.

Mr. COBB, from the Committee on Enrolled Bills, reported that they had examined and found truly enrolled a joint resolution (S. R. No. 129) to authorize the President to place at the disposal of the authorities of Portland, Maine, tents, camp and hospital furniture, and clothing for the use of families rendered homeless by the late fire; when the Speaker signed the same.

CONTESTED ELECTION—AGAIN.

Mr. DAWES. Mr. Speaker, I sincerely regret to be compelled again to force myself upon the House in the discussion of these uninviting and tiresome questions arising in contested elections. I had humbly hoped that I had earned a discharge from labor so unwelcome. And nothing could now induce me to undertake again a task of this kind but the fact that the case before us is from necessity spread over so much ground that it is impossible for the learned gentleman [Mr. PAINE] who has made this report to present to the House all the circumstances and questions involved within the time which one member may occupy in the discussion. Hence I am induced to beg the attention of the House for a few moments to one particular part of this case, in order that I may thereby relieve the gentleman from Wisconsin from a labor which, although I am conscious it could have been better performed by him, might possibly, in the limited time allowed, go unperformed unless I should attempt, however inadequately, to perform it.

I am compelled further to ask the indulgence of the House, because in undertaking to speak to-day I am laboring under an indisposition which really unfits me for presenting to the House any ideas worthy of its consideration. I never attempt to present any views from this committee without feeling that it becomes it more than any other committee to be faithful to the House; for the subject-matters intrusted to it are always of such a character that the investigation of their merits must to a great extent be performed in the committee-room; and while the committee can ask nobody to accept their views as final, yet as the questions cannot be examined in the House in the manner in which they can be in the committee, and in the manner in which their character may demand, there rests upon the committee the stronger obligation to be faithful to the House in the discharge of their duty.

Sir, the three learned gentlemen from Pennsylvania, while I admit their ability to examine this case with as much acumen as any other gentlemen, certainly as any other member of the committee, have failed altogether to touch the merits of the case. The question presented here is not, as those three gentlemen sought to have the House understand, a question of disfranchising soldiers. Unless I am altogether mistaken in the view which I take of this case, members will, when the facts are understood, be relieved from all anxiety lest they may, by following the report of the committee, unwittingly disfranchise soldiers who voted at the election here contested. Unless I mistake altogether this case, it is simply a question of fact—how many soldiers voted for the sitting member and how many for the contestant.

At the election which is now in dispute the sitting member had by the home vote 648 majority; and the whole question, the only question presented in the case, is whether the contestant had, on the soldiers' vote a sufficient majority to overcome the sitting member's majority of 684 on the home vote. The question presented by the contestant to the committee and the House is simply this: shall this House say that more soldiers voted for the contestant than for the sitting member merely because the contestant says so?

Mr. BINGHAM. Does the gentleman mean to be understood as saying that the contestant offers no proof as to the number of votes given for him, and that he has asked the committee and the House to act upon his statement alone?

Mr. DAWES. Mr. Speaker, nothing so embarrasses a member speaking in this House as to have other gentlemen paying such close attention to what he says that they anticipate his utterances, and question him to know whether he means to say this or that. I was just about to say, Mr. Speaker, that this case presents a peculiar feature, one which, according to my recollection, never appeared in any of the sixty different cases, in the examination and decision of which it has been my misfortune to participate; and that peculiar feature is this: a man comes here and contests the election of a sitting member who holds a certificate of the Governor of his State that he is entitled to the seat; yet the contestant does not offer one particle of testimony in support of his case. Notwithstanding these three large volumes, the testimony of a single witness has not been taken by the contestant in this case. I do not speak of ruling out testimony on technical grounds. There has been no attempt to examine a single witness on the stand anywhere touching the right of this man or proving that the majority should not declare the sitting member was entitled to the seat.

He has attempted, on the other hand, to support this claim by papers, papers of every sort and description, scraps of paper, abstracts of papers, papers without beginning or end, statements made to the Legislature of Pennsylvania in another election case in that body, certain papers from the prothonotary's office, certified papers from the secretary of state; but, sir, from the beginning to the end he has not attached those papers to his case or shown what application or influence they should have. I desire to go back and present this case from the stand-point of the reply made by the sitting member. The lucid and able report presented by the gentleman from Wisconsin closes with the contestant's side of the case; and when it is cleared away from the mistakes into which gentlemen naturally have fallen who depend upon their examination of the case here, it will be clear as sunlight that by the contestant's side of the case it stands as reported by the gentleman from Wisconsin. But I propose to go to the other side and show to the House what is the reply to that case made by the sitting member, and to show what effect that has on the merits of the case before I reach the counting of the votes.

I give the House warning that I am obliged to wade through a system of practice, introduced for the first time in my recollection in this case, so utterly in defiance of statute regulation as I think the House will, when they come to understand it, agree to what the gentleman from Wisconsin said yesterday, that it was the opinion of the committee that they had gone too far in this case to oblige the contestant without going into what he calls the merits of the case.

Sir, the modes of trial indicated by statute system, the pleading adopted in courts, the rules of allegation and answer adopted in this House to govern the action of tribunals before which facts are to be elicited, have foundation in fact, and in the long run conduce toward the truth and cannot be abandoned without destroying the assurance we may have of arriving at the truth. And no court does justice to itself that countenances defiant efforts by parties before it contrary to the rules sanctioned by courts of law.

I ask you, Mr. Speaker, to listen to what this Congress has said shall be the mode and method of trying election cases. I ask whether you propose to abandon and throw up the case and say there shall be no such thing hereafter as compelling a contestant to give a sitting member notice of the particular ground upon which the contestant proposes to make the contest. Now, the statute says:

"Whenever any person shall intend to contest the election of any member of the House of Representatives of the United States he shall within thirty days"—

I want you to mark that.

"That he shall within thirty days after the result of such election shall have been determined by the officer or board of canvassers"—

I ask the House to remember that—

"or board of canvassers authorized by law to determine the same, give notice in writing to the member whose seat he designs to contest that it is his intention to contest the same; and in such notice shall state particularly the grounds upon which he relies in the contest."

It is hardly worth while to call attention to the reasonableness of this. It is the law, and it is not only the law, but it is founded in reason and justice. See how it was conformed to in this case. On the 4th of November, 1864, the board of canvassers determined the result in this district, and gave to the sitting member his certificate of election. Subsequently to that, in conformity to law, on the 30th of December, the Governor of the Commonwealth issued a general proclamation declaring that these judges had decided that the sitting member was elected, with others. Within thirty days, says the statute, any one intending to contest the seat shall serve upon the member notice thereof; and the statute says expressly that the notice shall be served upon him.

When this statute was enacted an attempt was made to provide for a notice at his house, or to a third person residing at his house; and expressly did the Congress of the United States vote down the proposition to give that authority, and declared that it must be a personal notice on him. And this House, during this very present session, has adopted that construction in the case of Follett vs. Delano. For a notice to be served upon the sitting member according to law, it must have been served upon him personally before the 4th day of December last; that would make the thirty days. Now, this Congress met on the 4th day of December; the sitting member was a member of it, and it was known to everybody in Pennsylvania that he would probably be in his seat here that day. And yet, on the 6th day of December, thirty-two days after the notice, and at a time when the contestant must have known that the sitting member was in his seat here, what was done? I will read the return:

Fayette County, ss.:

On this 7th day of September, A. D. 1865, before me, the subscriber, one of the Commonwealth Justices of the peace in and for the county of Fayette, personally appeared Reason Lynch, who, being by me duly affirmed according to law, says that he served the within notice, by a true copy thereof, contesting the election of Hon. John L. Dawson, in the Thirty-Ninth Congress, by Smith Fuller, Esq., by leaving a copy of the same with Biddy Reynolds on the evening of the 6th day of December, A. D. 1864, at his residence, to which place he invited her, believing her to be his (Dawson's) housekeeper, she having the keys of his house, he and his family being absent from home at the time.

REASON LYNCH, Constable.

Affirmed and subscribed before me the day and date above mentioned.

WILLIAM L. WILKINSON,

Justice of the Peace.

That was all the notice that was ever served upon the sitting member, and it was given at his place of residence thirty-two days after he had received the certificate of election, and when it was known that he ought to have been in his seat here. They hunted up an Irish girl in some other part of the town, who had been, I suppose, although there is no evidence of the fact, a servant of the sitting member, enticed her to his house, and getting her to turn the door key handed over to her this notice; and that is all the notice that was ever served upon the sitting member. Now, I do not mean to impute to Mr. Smith Fuller any design to wait before serving his notice until the sitting member had come on here and taken his seat. I only say that if he did not know that the sitting member would leave his home before the 4th day of December, which was the end of the thirty days, then I am sorry for him.

The law says that the service of notice shall be personal. Now, how did we get over that? I am almost ashamed to tell the House; but in our anxiety to ascertain whether Smith Fuller really had any right to contest this seat on the merits, the committee put their heads together to get over this difficulty. And I will tell the House frankly, whatever opinion they may have of us as lawyers, how we got over it. We said, that for the purposes of this case, we would hold that the board of canvassers who canvassed the result and gave the certificate to the sitting member should not be considered as having determined the result, but that in order that justice might not fail, we would hold that the proclamation of the Governor stating who was elected should be the initial point from which the thirty days should run; and that he should have the right to serve his notice thirty days from that date. Well, we got into another trouble when we did that, because that proclamation was not issued until the 30th day of December, and the notice was served on the 6th; so that it was served twenty-four days too soon. I am on the "confessional" now, and I will tell you the whole story. He served his notice twenty-four days before the statute began to run; he fired off his gun too soon. [Laughter.] How did we get over that? We turned to the sitting member's answer, and we found this statement:

"This respondent is a Representative in the Thirty-Eighth Congress of the United States. The second session of that body commenced on the 5th day of December, 1864; and this respondent, to be in readiness for the discharge of his official duties, arrived in Washington city on the morning of the 4th. On the 12th of said month he received by mail, from Pittsburgh, Pennsylvania, a paper bearing date at Uniontown, Pennsylvania, December 3, 1864, with the name of Smith Fuller appended, purporting to be a notice to this respondent that the said Smith Fuller would contest his election as Representative of the twenty-first district of Pennsylvania in the Thirty-Ninth Congress of the United States. This respondent knew nothing of said papers until the said 12th day of December. Whether the same was written or signed by the said Smith Fuller, or by some other person, he does not know, and has no means of knowing."

That is to say, that in his answer he acknowledged that on the 12th day of December he got the notice. So we took him at his word. But that did not get us entirely out of the difficulty, because even that was eighteen days before the time began to run. We were therefore constrained to put our heads together again to get over that difficulty, and we did it in this way: we ruled, in order that justice might not fail, that if the sitting member got the notice on the 12th of December, he probably kept it till the 30th, and that we would presume that on the 30th it was in his possession; or that if a man gets a notice too soon and answers it, and does not take advantage of that defect, we decide that he might reasonably be held to have waived that objection.

Well, then, we had another trouble, because in this answer the sitting member says:

"This respondent therefore excepts to said pretended notice, for the following reasons, namely:

"1. That said pretended notice was never served.

"2. That said pretended notice was never served on this respondent personally.

"3. That said pretended notice was not served within the time required by law.

"This respondent further excepts to said pretended notice that the same is insensible, unintelligible, and so vague and general in its allegations as to furnish this respondent with no means whatever of making even a conjecture as to the particular grounds upon which said Fuller designs to contest the validity of his election."

And last of all we were driven to rule, in order that the case might not fall right through, that excepting to the notice on the ground that it was not served within the time was not excepting to it on the ground that it was served before the time; and under that ruling we held the respondent to answer to this notice.

I submit, therefore, that the Committee of Elections might well query whether they had not gone too far for the ease and comfort of such men as may serve upon that committee in time to come. Now, I ask the House to listen for one moment to the allegations of the contestant, to see what it is that this respondent is required to meet. He undertook to sustain his case by eleven allegations, all of which but three he abandoned on the hearing before the committee. And he really undertook to sustain but one of them. Before I proceed further, however, I wish once more to read to the House from the statute what should be the character of this notice:

"And in such notice shall specify particularly the grounds upon which he relies in the contest."

Mr. SCOFIELD. The gentleman will allow me to ask him a question. The remarks of the gentleman in relation to this notice are an entire surprise to me, and I feel constrained to notice them. I want to ask the gentleman if the committee was not unanimous, himself leading off, in deciding that the time from which the thirty days began to run was the day upon which the Governor issued his proclamation, and if he did not himself decide, in a case which we had in the last Congress, that where the notice was given too early, if an acknowledgment of it was made by the sitting member or the contestant as the case might be, without objecting to the time, that was a sufficient notice. Was not the decision that the time began to run from the proclamation of the Governor in Pennsylvania, and did not the gentleman bring forward his own precedent in the case of the last session? Did not he himself approve it, and was not the decision unanimous by the committee? There was no such straining or arguing to evade the law or the fact presented by anybody in that committee.

Mr. DAWES. That the statement of the facts surprises the gentleman from Pennsylvania [Mr. SCOFIELD] does not surprise me so much as it does that he thinks his present statement conflicts at all with what I have said.

Mr. SCOFIELD. What I mean to say is this: there are a great many things which the gentleman has stated which I believe to be wholly and literally true. But his whole version of the matter is such a burlesque of the reasons that influenced the committee in deciding this question, that if it was anywhere else I would say that the gentleman was designing to burlesque it. Still, with his solemn voice and impressive manner, and marching up and down the aisle, I suppose he designs to have the House understand that he is not making a burlesque of it.

Mr. DAWES. I will state that the gentleman has failed to point out wherein I have misstated one single thing. I admit that I tried all I could to get over this difficulty and reach the merits of the case. But I have never been over the ground in my own mind since without its seeming, as it strikes the gentleman from Pennsylvania [Mr. SCOFIELD] to-day, that it was more of a burlesque than a proper administration of the law. And hence it was that the committee, looking back to the standpoint of five weeks' examination, came to the conclusion that it was a pity they had not held these parties to the law and required of them that they should conform to it. Now, there never was any reason in the world given why the contestant waited thirty-two days, until Mr. Dawson had left his home for Washington city, and then went out and hunted up the house-keeper in the country, and persuaded her to go to the house while they went through the farce of serving this notice. There were thirty days in November while Mr. Dawson was at home, when the notice could have been served there properly.

Mr. WILLIAMS. Will the gentleman allow me to interrupt him a moment?

Mr. DAWES. Yes, sir.

Mr. WILLIAMS. Inasmuch as I can find nothing in the report of the Committee of Elections upon the point that my friend from Massachusetts [Mr. DAWES] is discussing, I would like to ask him, as a lawyer, whether the point as to the insufficiency of this notice has not been overruled by the committee in compelling the respondent to answer, thereby premitting all these merely formal matters.

Mr. DAWES. In entire frankness I will say to the gentleman that for the purpose of hearing this case we did require the respondent to answer under these circumstances. And I was about to ask the House to hear what the sitting member was compelled to meet, specifying the ground upon which this contest was based. It was this, and this only:

"11. For that in the counties of Fayette, Westmoreland, and Indiana, which comprises and forms the twenty-first congressional district of the State of Pennsylvania, of the votes cast for Congress in and for the said counties of said district on the 11th day of October, 1864, being the second Tuesday of October, 1864, Smith Fuller had for Congress 11,063 votes; John L. Dawson had for Congress 10,348 votes."

The whole statement may be summed up in seven words: "I had more votes than Mr. Dawson." Now, is that a conformity with the statute which requires that the party contesting shall state specifically the ground upon which he relies? He does not say whether in this county or that county he had more votes than the sitting member. He does not say whether the majority in this county or that is different from what the board of canvassers made it to be. He does not say whether they counted votes that ought not to have been counted, or whether they omitted to count votes that should have been counted. Let me ask the House, what notice is that to the sitting member that he can meet? And under that notice what could not the contestant prove, and therefore what could the sitting member have noticed that he was going to prove? There is no allegation known to the law of elections to which this notice would not apply just as well as to any other.

But the contestant claimed under this notice the right to recount all the votes in this district, and to show that by a recount he would have had a majority and the sitting member a minority. The committee gave him permission to show, if he could, that counting all the votes that were cast in this congressional district he had received more than the sitting member. Now, I ask again, Mr. Speaker, can you conceive of a case in which a contestant can oust a sitting member by a recount of all the votes, yet not take a single deposition? Is there any way—I put it to my learned friend from Pennsylvania, [Mr. THAYER,] who does me the honor to listen to me—is there any way in which a contestant can show what votes were counted and what votes were not counted without taking somebody's deposition? Can any one, without taking depositions, give his certificate that certain votes were counted and certain other votes were not counted? If that cannot be done, then there is an end of this case; for there is not a particle of testimony in the whole proceeding to show what votes were counted and what votes were not counted. Here is the sitting member occupying the seat under the proclamation of the Governor or the certificate of the board of canvassers; and the contestant comes here—my distinguished colleague on the committee [Mr. SCOFIELD] will correct me if this is not the fact—asking to recount all the votes and bringing in what he calls evidence of votes, yet totally abstaining from showing what votes were counted and what votes were not. Ordinarily the presumption is that the man holding the certificate is elected; and he who seeks to reverse the decision of the board of canvassers, made in accordance with the law of the State, and maintains that another man has the majority, should at least undertake to prove it.

Mr. THAYER. I desire to ask the gentleman whether the contestant offered evidence under any other specification than that which the gentleman has mentioned.

Mr. DAWES. The contestant openly abandoned all the specifications but three; and he offered no evidence under any except the eleventh.

Mr. SCOFIELD. The gentleman will allow me to explain. At one time a remark was made which was understood as an abandonment of the greater part of the specifications; but afterward, when it appeared that the committee had put this construction upon the remark, the explanation was made on behalf of the contestant that it had never been his design to make any such abandonment.

Mr. DAWES. I have stated the matter in the hearing of all the members of the committee who were present. My friend from Pennsylvania and myself do not agree in our recollection of it. I think, however, the gentleman will admit that this eleventh specification is the only one under which the contestant offered any testimony. If the gentleman can point out any testimony offered under any other specification, I shall be glad to have him do so.

Mr. SCOFIELD. I will concede just what the gentleman himself said in the beginning—that there were no depositions. The evidence in the case on the part of the contestant was all record evidence. Yet I do not understand that this justifies the gentleman from Massachusetts in maintaining that the contestant presented no proof.

Mr. THAYER. I desire to ask the chairman of the committee whether there was any other specification to which the evidence would apply.

Mr. DAWES. There was not. I never, before to-day, heard anybody suggest that there was. I say this in the hearing of all the members of the committee who took part in the examination of the case. I have regretted exceedingly, and I regret it to-day more than ever, that the learned gentleman from Ohio [Mr. SHELLABARGER] was compelled to be absent during the hearing of this case by his duties upon another committee. The gentleman from Michigan [Mr. URSOX] was sick, and thus we lost his services. Two other members of the committee—the gentleman from Pennsylvania [Mr. SCOFIELD] and the gentleman from Vermont [Mr. BAXTER]—differed with the majority of the committee. I entertain a firm conviction that if we could have had the assistance of the gentleman from Ohio, with the exhaustive ability which he brings to the examination of every subject falling within his province to investigate, we should have had him to-day supporting actively the report of the committee.

Mr. SHELLABARGER. I avail myself of the kindness of the chairman of the committee to say this in regard to the matter to which he has alluded, and which occurred when I was in attendance on the investigation of this case, and that is the matter of the abandonment or non-abandonment of a specification in the contestant's statement or petition. The only point of difference in our recollection in regard to that record is this: I think there was no abandonment, although I think the remark was once made, but was afterward withdrawn as having been made inadvertently, or as one they did not want the committee to abide by. So much for that. As to whether there is any evidence applicable to the case or not, from my absence from the deliberations of the committee I am unable to say.

Mr. DAWES. I will, Mr. Speaker, dispatch the rest of the case very rapidly. The counsel for the sitting member inquired of the contestant if the testimony which I hold in my hand was what he relied upon, and he stated affirmatively before the committee it was what he relied upon and all that he relied upon. Then we proceeded to the hearing of the preliminary questions. When we got through the preliminary questions we met to hear the parties on the book which I hold in my hand. The contestant was not there. We did not see his counsel for three weeks. Where he went and what he went for we knew not until the committee had a telegram from Harrisburg asking what testimony we wanted and whether the original records at Harrisburg would not answer. That was the first intimation we had of his whereabouts. This was after having stated this testimony was all that he relied upon. Yet, without telling the committee, he left and went we knew not whither.

Now, in due time this volume came back. The statutes of Pennsylvania require that the soldiers' vote shall be returned to two places—to Harrisburg and to the prothonotary's office in each county, so that there would be two papers. His paper consisted of simple statements, scraps of paper and not copies of anything in the world; simple statements of votes without stating before whom they were cast or how; 20 votes for Dawson here and 20 for Fuller there; so many in another place for Fuller and so many for Dawson, without telling how or when, giving the committee no knowledge whether they could be relied upon or not.

The other attempt was to get the poll-books, going to the prothonotary's office to get some and going to the secretary's office to get the others. It was not an attempt to get the whole of them at the secretary's office or the whole of them at the prothonotary's office, but some at the prothonotary's office and some at the secretary's office. It was an attempt to get a full poll-book wherever it was deemed to be desirable.

What the contestant says is that the whole vote of this district, upon which he relies, and upon which he argues before this committee and the House, gives him a majority of 18. Now, Mr. Speaker, we are asked to count these votes as shown in the certificates of poll-books purporting to come from the office of the prothonotary and from the office of the secretary of the Commonwealth. I say it is necessary, in the first instance, to prove these are returns. It is necessary to show when they came and whence they came. They were votes certified to be in the secretary's office, but I know that the certificate of election was given to the sitting member. I submit there ought to be evidence to show when they came there. The soldiers' law of Pennsylvania says if they shall come in after the time when they are sent in accordance with the law they shall be counted as well as those which came in before, so that they may not be lost. I submit to every lawyer in this House, that returns brought from the secretary's office fourteen months after that date should be accompanied with some testimony showing that it was taken at the proper place and at the proper time.

Mr. MILLER. I ask the gentleman if the seal of the State is not of some account.

Mr. DAWES. I submit that all that a man can certify to under the seal of the State is a copy of the record. He cannot certify a fact. If that be so, then the taking of depositions is useless. If he can certify anything except a record, I want to know what it is. There is no record, no minute, nothing in one of these papers showing when it came into the office. It was the easiest thing in the world to take the deposition of the secretary to show when they came there. They were not obtained till fourteen months afterward, and he could have sworn when they came there. But that is not all. I promised to relieve this case of every technicality sought to be thrown around it by the three gentlemen from Pennsylvania who have spoken upon it. I hold in my hand the statement of this whole vote as furnished to the committee by the contestant himself, entitled "classified statement of the entire military vote." I wish to ask my colleague on the committee, [Mr. SCOFIELD,] and the gentleman from the Harrisburg district, [Mr. MILLER,] and the other gentleman from Pennsylvania, [Mr. LAWRENCE,] if there is a single vote that is not on this paper.

Mr. SCOFIELD. I never saw the paper, and cannot, therefore, state.

Mr. DAWES. I regret to learn that the gentleman never saw the brief of the contestant in this case, furnished by him at the request of the committee, used by him in the argument of the cause, and printed by the committee at his request for the use of the House. And yet my friend, who has undertaken to argue this case to the House, says he never saw it and does not know what it is. I ask the gentleman from the Harrisburg district if there is a single vote in any camp or hospital that is not upon this paper entitled "classified statement of the entire military vote."

Mr. MILLER. I took all the votes that were referred to in the report. I did not see any brief that the gentleman speaks of.

Mr. DAWES. I ask the other gentleman from Pennsylvania [Mr. LAWRENCE] the same question.

Mr. LAWRENCE, of Pennsylvania. It is very easy to ask that question. Gentlemen on the committee say they never saw that brief. All we have stated is based on the report itself, which shows that the contestant has a majority.

Mr. DAWES. I thought nothing could be fairer, and therefore I put the question, so that the gentlemen might answer it if they could.

Mr. SCOFIELD. I do not know what the paper is, and I have not time to examine it. The gentleman gets up and swings a paper around triumphantly, and when I tell him I know nothing about it, that I have never seen it, he commences a sort of—I do not know what to call it. I do not know whether he is arguing or scolding at me.

Mr. DAWES. There is a copy of it.

Mr. SCOFIELD. I have no occasion to look at it, but if the gentleman wants to scold me about it, I would like to have him do it in a little different tone.

Mr. DAWES. I submit that I am not scolding anybody. I am dealing fairly with this case, and I did suppose that nothing could be fairer than to take the contestant's own statement of these votes and ask if there was any member of the House who knew of a single vote that the contestant claimed that is not on this paper. If there is, I would like to know it. I state on my responsibility as a member of the committee, that I hold in my hand a paper prepared by the contestant taking the whole vote of this district. It is printed and in circulation about the House. If I am wrong I am innocently wrong, and I will beg any member of the House to show me my error. The contestant here sums up the aggregate of Westmoreland, Indiana, and Fayette counties, miscellaneous returns and all, adds the civil vote, and brings out the result as follows: for the contestant, 10,984; for the sitting member, 10,966; majority for the contestant, 18.

I think I may assume that the House will believe me when I state that this is every vote he claims; and that upon this paper which I hold in my hand he has recounted the poll-books upon which he relies; and he has been kind enough to give us the pages upon which you can find any one of them.

Now, the first thing I desire to say about this paper is, that in order to be satisfied that this man's majority was 18, as he states, you must be satisfied that here are all the poll-books. I am not alluding now to that one which the gentlemen from Pennsylvania have claimed was omitted. That is in here. But is it not necessary, if he asks you to count the vote of the whole district, and brings in papers here which he claims are the poll-books of the whole district, that he should prove that this is the entire poll of the district? There is not one particle of evidence of that fact.

Mr. LAWRENCE, of Pennsylvania. I want to ask the gentleman if they have not records from all of these counties, made out by the prothonotaries and sworn to.

Mr. DAWES. No, sir; we have not a single scrap of paper sworn to except this affidavit in relation to Biddy Reynolds.

[Here the hammer fell.]

Mr. DAWES. I ask the House to allow me ten minutes that I may go through this paper. I think I can close in ten minutes, but I should not like to be limited to that time.

Mr. PAINE. I ask unanimous consent that the time of the gentleman from Massachusetts be extended.

No objection was made.

Mr. DAWES. I propose to show, without the slightest technicality, and by this man's own tables, that he was in a minority.

Before I come to that, however, let me say that no man can ask us to take these tables, and add up all these votes, and then say that the contestant has a majority over the sitting member, unless we are satisfied that the tables contain all the votes cast. And we cannot be satisfied of that without some evidence. There is not a man living who can say that there is a particle of evidence to show that. And not only that, there is evidence that one of the poll-books is gone, and no reason has ever been given for its disappearance. I call the attention of the House to the fact that poll-book No. 52, of Indiana county, is put down here in the returns as an entire blank; No. 51 is here, and No. 53 is here; but there is no return at all of No. 52, either from the prothonotary or the secretary of state. The entire poll is gone, and they give no reason for it in this paper; and yet, leaving out this one poll, the contestant claims a majority of 18.

But that is not all, Mr. Speaker. I ask you to look at this poll; it foots up, in the absence of one poll-book, 18 majority for the contestant; but that 18 is made up in this way, the votes in No. 51 and No. 61 in Indiana county, are counted twice. I take it, that however much he may love the soldiers, the soldiers' very warm-hearted friend from Pennsylvania [Mr. MILLER] would not require that we should count their votes twice. No. 61 in Indiana county was the Tyler hospital. There were but three votes cast, but they were counted, as you will find on page 144, and put down as cast at the Tyler hospital. The poll-book gives the names of the voters and their residence. Turn now to page 281, and you find there another poll-book, all perfect in form, except that the place where the poll was held is left blank. They asked us not to reject the poll-book because the place was left blank, and insisted that we should count the vote, and we did count it. But when you turn to the poll-book you find that the names and the places of residence are the same as those on the poll-book on page 144. So that 3 of the 18 votes have been counted twice, and that reduces the alleged majority to 15.

And upon pages 81, 83, and 89 there are three more that have been counted twice. Their names are James McCrackin of Brush Valley, Isaac Oberdorf of Brush Valley, and Jacob Crist of Mount Pleasant. Their names are given, their companies are given, and their residences are given; and their votes are counted twice. That takes three more from his 18 majority, leaving him but 12.

And upon page 84 of the first book there are 31 votes counted for 30, a mistake of 1, reducing the majority claimed to 11. Then I call the attention of the House to page 81, to what is counted as 13 votes for Fuller and 1 for Dawson. It is this: "for senator in the Senate of the State of Pennsylvania, 14 votes, of which Smith Fuller had 13 votes and John L. Dawson had 1 vote." That is all there is in the return; there is no evidence of anything else. It is a solemn certificate that 14 votes were cast, 13 for Smith Fuller and 1 for Dawson, for senator in the senate of the State of Pennsylvania. And those votes are counted to help make up this majority of 18. Now, I do not know of any informalities that can be overlooked. It might have been a mistake, but if so it was the easiest thing in the world to take a deposition to show that it was a mistake. But all the evidence before us is to the effect that the votes thus given were cast for State Senator, and not for member of Congress. By deducting these votes you get a majority of 1 for the sitting member instead of 18 for the contestant. But that is not all.

Here is another, pages 232 and 235, company K, two hundred and thirty-first regiment, Fayette county, 6 votes. The tally-paper, the list of votes with the names of the persons who voted at the State election of the qualified voters of Fayette county, State of Pennsylvania, "for members in the House of Representatives of the United States, John L. Dawson, 2 votes; Smith Fuller, 8 votes." That is signed by nobody; it is a little strip of paper not signed by anybody. And yet those votes are counted to make out this majority of 18 for the contestant. Now, deducting also those 6 votes, and it puts him in a minority of 7 on his own paper. I will not insult the good sense of the House by arguing that a simple slip of paper with nobody's name signed to it should not be regarded. I might have made out the paper myself; non constat but I did make it. There is no evidence in the world whence it came or whither it goes.

Now, take McClellan hospital, No. 6, Westmoreland county. There is a return just like the last to which I have referred, signed by nobody, simply a piece of paper with a statement upon it, such as I might pick up in a dozen places in this House, with no name attached to it anywhere. Yet that is counted to give 3 more votes to the contestant, which, being also deducted, puts him in a minority of 10.

Then, on page 333, there is another return just exactly like these last, with nobody's name signed to it, without any more authentication than a mere newspaper paragraph, which is included to give 2 more votes to the contestant to make up his majority of 18. Now, deduct also those 2 votes, and upon his own paper he is placed in a minority of 12 votes.

Then there is Camp Hamilton, page 301, without a particle of testimony, a particle of evidence, with no certificate, with nobody's name signed to it whatever. That is used to give 1 vote to make up the 18 majority claimed by the contestant. Now, deduct that 1 vote also, and instead of the contestant having a majority of 18 votes, he is shown by his own paper to be in a minority of at least 13 votes. There is one paper having upon it a statement of 10 votes for the contestant and 13 for the sitting member; but this paper has no signature attached. So that the same rule would apply to that if the two papers stand upon an equality. But who produces it? The contestant produces it. Yet he does not show what use was ever made of it anywhere; he does not show that it was ever counted anywhere.

Thus, Mr. Speaker, if any member of this House, feeling an anxiety lest we should by our action deprive some soldier of his vote, has done me the honor to listen to what I have said, I think he must be convinced of one of two things: either I have not stated the facts correctly, or the contestant is 13 votes in the minority by the showing of his own paper.

Mr. SCOFIELD. If the gentleman will allow me to interrupt him, I desire to say that if he will turn to the record in the case, for instance, of the vote in McClellan hospital, he will find on pages 6 and 7 the return properly signed, giving the names of the voters. It is true that the certificate of the oaths is wanting there; but this will be found fully given on page 380.

Mr. DAWES. There are two returns from McClellan hospital; one for Westmoreland county, the other for Fayette or Indiana county.

Mr. SCOFIELD. The gentleman is thinking of the returns from Lincoln hospital.

Mr. DAWES. Well, Mr. Speaker, I prefer to allow the contestant the benefit of those 3 votes, still leaving the sitting member with a clear majority, rather than detain the House by a minute examination of that matter.

This case, Mr. Speaker, has been examined by the committee with a patience and assiduity which, I venture to say, have scarcely a parallel in investigations of this character. The committee waived in behalf of the contestant every difficulty and objection which they possibly could waive in order to reach the merits of the case. The several gentlemen from Pennsylvania who have advocated the claims of the contestant with so much zeal and ability have directed their attention to various returns connected with this case, but no one of those gentlemen has even looked at the contestant's own brief. They all appear to have been ignorant of its existence until I called their attention to it here in the House. I have taken up that brief and have, I think, shown conclusively that the contestant on his own showing did not receive a majority of all the votes of the district.

There are other papers in this case to which I might refer in confirmation of the position which I have taken; but at this late hour I will not tax my own strength or the patience of the House by dwelling upon them. I repeat, that this case presents no question about disfranchising soldiers. I affirm that it is impossible to make out a majority of votes for the contestant unless you count votes which were cast for other officers, or count the same votes twice, or count votes which have no authentication whatever. I leave this case to the good judgment and good sense of each member of the House.

Mr. PAINE. I am informed that the gentleman from Pennsylvania [Mr. KELLEY] and the gentleman from Ohio [Mr. SHELLABARGER] desire to speak on this question. If they do I will yield the floor to them. If not I will call for the previous question to-morrow after the morning hour.

Mr. SHELLABARGER. I do not want to say anything this afternoon, but if permitted I may want to say a word or two to-morrow.

Mr. WASHBURN, of Illinois, demanded the previous question.

The previous question was seconded, and the main question ordered.

Mr. WASHBURN, of Illinois, moved to reconsider the vote by which the main question was ordered; and also moved that the motion to reconsider be laid on the table.

The latter motion was agreed to.

And then, on motion of Mr. PAINE, (at five o'clock and five minutes p. m.,) the House adjourned.

On motion of Mr. EDMUNDS, and by unanimous consent, the reading of the Journal of yesterday was dispensed with.

REPORTS FROM COMMITTEES.

Mr. POMEROY, from the Committee on Public Lands, to whom were referred various petitions and memorials concerning land grants in the southern States which expire in 1866, reported a bill (S. No. 422) to revise and extend certain of the provisions of an act approved the 3d day of June, 1856, entitled "An act granting public lands in alternate sections to the State of Alabama, to aid in the construction of certain railroads in said State and for other purposes;" and a bill (S. No. 423) amendatory of the act granting public lands in alternate sections to the States of Florida and Alabama, to aid in the construction of railroads in said States, approved May 17, 1856. The bills were severally read a first time by their titles and passed to a second reading.

Mr. GUTHRIE. I am directed by the Committee on Finance, to whom was referred the bill (S. No. 379) to amend the several acts to indemnify the States for expenses incurred by them in defense of the United States, and also a resolution, to report an amendment to the bill as a substitute for the bill and resolution; and I ask for its present consideration.

Mr. POMEROY. I hope we shall be allowed to complete the morning business, and therefore I trust the bill will not be considered now.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. Is there any objection to the present consideration of the bill?

Mr. POMEROY. Yes, sir; I object.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. Objection being made, the bill cannot be considered on the day it is reported.

He also, from the same committee, to whom was referred a bill (S. No. 41) explanatory of certain joint resolutions therein named, giving bounties to persons enlisting in the regular or volunteer service of the United States; and the joint resolution (S. R. No. 18) respecting the three months' extra pay to officers of volunteers when mustered out of service, asked to be discharged from their further consideration; which was agreed to.

UNION PACIFIC RAILROAD.

Mr. HOWARD. The Committee on Military Affairs and the Militia, to whom was referred a joint resolution (S. R. No. 125) granting the right of way through military reserves to the Union Pacific Railroad Company and its branches, have had it under consideration, and directed me to report it back to the Senate and recommend its passage; and I beg to ask the Senate to put the joint resolution on its passage now, because it is very necessary at this time. I hope, therefore, that it will be considered at once.

By unanimous consent, the Senate, as in Committee of the Whole, resumed the consideration of the joint resolution.

Mr. FESSENDEN. Has that resolution come from any committee?

Mr. HOWARD. Yes, sir; it is just reported.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. It is reported by the Committee on Military Affairs and the Militia.

Mr. FESSENDEN. I think it ought to be referred to the Committee on Public Lands.

Mr. POMEROY. I notice one feature in the resolution by which it is provided that when these lands are not wanted for military purposes they shall be restored to the public lands. The lands in these military reservations are very valuable, and it has not been our system heretofore to restore them to the public at $1 25 an acre. We have always had military reservations, when no longer wanted for military purposes, sold at whatever they would bring, but under this bill you restore them to the public lands and then they can be taken at $1 25. I do not want to object to the resolution, but I say that is a feature which we have never adopted in any bill which came from the Committee on Public Lands.

Mr. SHERMAN. There is one clause of this resolution which I certainly object to. I have no objection to the grant of the right of way through the Fort Riley reservation to this railroad, and sufficient ground for the necessary stations; but the second clause of it, if I heard it read correctly, grants to all railroads running through reservations not only the right but all that is necessary for their buildings and station houses. For instance, suppose they should go through the reservation at Fort Leavenworth, an immensely valuable piece of property. The only limitation here is, I believe, twenty acres in the midst of the Fort Riley reservation for stations, &c. I do not wish to grant anything more than is necessary for the occasion. I have no doubt that the railroad named here ought to have the right of way through the Fort Riley reservation, with suitable stations and grounds; but I think they ought to be confined to that one object, and it should not be made general.

Mr. HOWARD. If the Senator from Ohio will look at the resolution he will see that none of those grounds can be taken by the railroad without the consent of the President.

Mr. SHERMAN. I know; but the President has not the information, and we ought not to throw this duty upon him.

Mr. HOWARD. As a matter of course it will be referred to the proper Department for examination, and if an extravagant quantity is required by the road, of course it will not be granted. I know of no safer mode than to refer such questions to the proper Department of the Government, who have access to the maps and public surveys and can determine better than anybody else as to the quantity that is required.

Mr. SHERMAN. The remark of the Senator might apply very well to a right of way, if the road must pass over a reservation, but not to station grounds on the reservation, because there will be grounds surrounding the reservation which the railroad companies could purchase.

Mr. HOWARD. It is not possible for us to lay down any more safe and accurate rule than this resolution contains in itself as to the quantity necessary to be taken.

Mr. POMEROY. It is very important that the company should have the right of way, but I suggest to the Senator from Michigan to put in a clause that when the reservation is not needed for military purposes, it shall be disposed of under such rules and regulations as the Secretary of the Interior may prescribe.

Mr. HOWARD. I have no objection to such an amendment.

Mr. POMEROY. I suggest it only.

Mr. SHERMAN. I move to amend the resolution by striking out, in lines four and five, the words "and the necessary grounds for depots, stations, shops," &c.; so as to make it read simply:

That, subject to approval by the President, the right of way, one hundred feet in width, is hereby granted to the Union Pacific Railroad Company and the companies constructing the branch roads connecting therewith, for the construction and operation of their roads over and upon all military reservations through which the same may pass.

It also then specifically grants to the eastern division twenty acres of the Fort Riley reservation.

Mr. HOWARD. I hope that amendment will not be adopted. The grounds for depots, stations, shops, &c., may be just as necessary in a military reservation as the right of way itself. It may be necessary to establish a depot upon a military reservation. It may be to the public interest to do so. Very often it is for the public interest. Why, then, should they be prohibited from having the necessary grounds for their depots and machine-shops, and everything else connected with a station?

Mr. SHERMAN. This resolution provides for a grant of twenty acres at the Fort Riley reservation; and if a case should hereafter occur at any reservation we can provide for it. They will not reach any other fort for a year or two, at any rate.

Mr. HOWARD. I cannot see the necessity for particular acts of legislation whenever a case of this kind may arise. Why not enact it in the shape of a general law, leaving the execution of the law to the President, under the advice of the heads of the proper Departments? There is no danger in it at all; on the other hand, I think the public interests will be better secured by this provision. I hope the amendment will not prevail.

The question being put, there were, on a division—ayes 18, noes 4; no quorum voting.

Mr. GRIMES. I call for the yeas and nays.

The yeas and nays were ordered; and being taken, resulted—yeas 20, nays 5; as follows:

YEAS—Messrs. Anthony, Clark, Conness, Davis, Edmunds, Fessenden, Foster, Grimes, Guthrie, Hendricks, Johnson, Morgan, Norton, Saulsbury, Sherman, Sprague, Sumner, Trumbull, Van Winkle, and Wiley—20.

NAYS—Messrs. Howard, Lane of Indiana, Ramsey, Wade, and Wilson—5.

ABSENT—Messrs. Brown, Buckalew, Chandler, Cowan, Cragin, Creswell, Dixon, Doolittle, Harris, Henderson, Howe, Kirkwood, Lane of Kansas, McDougal, Morrill, Nesmith, Nye, Poland, Pomeroy, Riddle, Stewart, Williams, Wright, and Yates—24.

So the amendment was agreed to.

Mr. HENDRICKS. If it is the intention of this resolution to give these lands to the railroad company, then it should pass, I suppose, as reported; but if it is intended simply to give them the use of the land, then these words ought to be stricken out from the nineteenth to the twenty-second lines, "the same when so restored to be subject to existing laws concerning public lands in the same manner that they would have been if said reserves had never been made." If these lands happen to fall upon odd sections they will come, under the grant, to the railroad company; so that the company will have the absolute ownership under the original grant if these words are left in the resolution. If that be the purpose of the committee, and it is the pleasure of the Senate to do so, I have no objection; but to test that, I move to amend the resolution by striking out those words.

Mr. HOWARD. I have no objection to their being struck out.

The amendment was agreed to.

The joint resolution was reported to the Senate as amended, and the amendments made as in Committee of the Whole were concurred in. The resolution was ordered to be engrossed for a third reading, and it was read the third time and passed.

THE TARIFF BILL.

Mr. ANTHONY. The Committee on Printing, to whom was referred a resolution to print a thousand copies of the tariff bill, have directed me to report it back without amendment and to recommend its passage. I ask for the present consideration of the resolution.

The resolution was considered by unanimous consent and agreed to, as follows:

Resolved, That there be printed for the use of the Senate, one thousand additional copies of the bill (H. R. No. 718) to provide increased revenue from imports, and for other purposes.

RETROCESSION OF ALEXANDRIA.

Mr. WILLIAMS. I move to reconsider the vote of the Senate refusing to pass Senate bill No. 280, to repeal an act entitled "An act to retrocede Alexandria in the District of Columbia, to the State of Virginia," and for other purposes. I do not propose to ask any immediate action on the motion; but I desire to have it entered at this time.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The motion to reconsider will be entered.

BILLS INTRODUCED.

Mr. WILLEY asked, and by unanimous consent obtained, leave to introduce a bill (S. No. 424) to incorporate the Washington Temperance Society of the city of Washington, District of Columbia; which was read twice by its title and referred to the Committee on the District of Columbia.

Mr. WILLEY also asked, and by unanimous consent obtained, leave to introduce a bill (S. No. 425) to provide for restoring to the States lately in insurrection their full political rights; which was read twice by its title.

Mr. WILLEY. The committee of fifteen having acted upon that subject, and desiring when their bill shall come up for consideration to offer the one I now propose as an amendment, I move that it be laid on the table and be printed.

The motion was agreed to.

Mr. WADE asked, and by unanimous consent obtained, leave to introduce a bill (S. No. 426) to punish adultery in the District of Columbia, and for other purposes; which was read twice by its title and referred to the Committee on the District of Columbia.

HOUSE BILL REFERRED.

The joint resolution (H. R. No. 187) recommending the organization and instruction of the militia of the several States, and providing for the distribution of ordnance and ordnance stores, was read twice by its title and referred to the Committee on Military Affairs and the Militia.

TONNAGE TAX ON VESSELS.

Mr. CONNESS asked, and by unanimous consent obtained, leave to introduce a joint resolution (S. No. 130) to construe an act amendatory of certain acts imposing duties on foreign importations, approved March 3, 1865; which was read twice by its title.

Mr. CONNESS. I ask for the present consideration of the resolution; and on a slight explanation I know that the Senate will not object to it.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. It requires the unanimous consent of the Senate to consider the resolution on the day it is introduced. No objection being made, the joint resolution is before the Senate as in Committee of the Whole, and will be read at length.

The Secretary read the joint resolution, which provides that the second proviso of section four of an act entitled "An act amendatory of certain acts imposing duties on foreign importations," approved March 3, 1865, shall be construed to include any ship, vessel, or steamer to or from any port in the Sandwich Islands or the Society Islands.

Mr. FESSENDEN. I will state to the Senator that that is one of the clauses in the tariff bill which was postponed until December next.

Mr. CONNESS. I knew that.

Mr. FESSENDEN. I presume the Senator knows it. The subject has been under consideration in the House committee, and I think it can hardly be worth while to separate this from others. There will be a bill brought in to amend several of those sections.

Mr. CONNESS. If the Senator will listen to me for a moment, I think he will have no objection to it.

Mr. FESSENDEN. I have no objection to it; I think it is all right; but it will be included with several other sections in a bill which will be reported and probably passed, and I see no occasion for separating it from the others.

Mr. CONNESS. At this session?

Mr. FESSENDEN. At this session.

Mr. CONNESS. Is that the intention?

Mr. FESSENDEN. That is the intention. If it is not done in the House it will be done by the Senate committee.

Mr. CONNESS. I hold in my hand a letter on the subject showing, and of course the law itself shows, that it was the original intention to release all vessels making those short voyages from the payment of the tax, except once a year, while all those vessels are now subject to the payment of thirty cents tonnage on their trip. If the honorable chairman says that it will be reached at this session, of course that will be enough on the subject.

Mr. FESSENDEN. A bill will be reported from our committee unless the one reported in the House and now under consideration is speedily acted upon.

Mr. CONNESS. Then I move to refer the pending resolution to the Committee on Finance.

The motion was agreed to.

SEWARD A. FOOT.

Mr. POLAND submitted the following resolution; which was referred to the Committee to Audit and Control the Contingent Expenses of the Senate:

Resolved, That there be paid out of the contingent fund of the Senate to Seward A. Foot, the sum of $180 in full for services as clerk of committee.

COMMITTEE CLERKS.

Mr. SPRAGUE. I move that the Senate proceed to the consideration of the resolution increasing the pay of the clerk of the Committee on Military Affairs and the Militia, and the clerk of the Committee on the District of Columbia.

The motion was agreed to; and the Senate resumed the consideration of the following resolution:

Resolved, That the annual compensation of the clerks of the Committees on Military Affairs and the Militia and the District of Columbia, shall hereafter be the same as that of the clerks of the Committees on Finance, Printing, and Claims, commencing July 1, 1866.

Mr. CHANDLER. I move to amend the resolution by adding the clerk of the Committee on Commerce.

Mr. GRIMES. Is there not a motion already pending? If I remember aright, I made a motion when this subject was under consideration before to refer the resolution to the Committee on Contingent Expenses to consider the whole subject as to all these clerks, and if it be necessary that their pay shall be increased, let the committee make it uniform.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. An examination of the record shows that that is now the motion pending upon the resolution. The amendment therefore, perhaps, will not be in order without unanimous consent. It is moved that the resolution be referred to the Committee to Audit and Control the Contingent Expenses of the Senate.

Mr. SPRAGUE. I trust that will not be the disposition of this resolution. The object of a reference is for information, as I understand, upon all matters that come before this body. This resolution has already been before the Senate twice; it has taken up a great deal of its time, and is understood by every member. It is understood and wanted by the chairmen of the respective committees to which it refers. It is not perhaps so much necessary to the chairman of the Committee on the District of Columbia, though he would not object to it; but it is necessary for the proper administration of the business of the Committee on Military Affairs and the Militia. I believe it; the chairman believes it; he asks for it; and I can see no real objection to the Senate considering the subject at the present time.

Mr. FESSENDEN. I hope the resolution will be referred. The Senator from Rhode Island, I think, is very much mistaken in one respect. We get the information at second-hand, altogether. The chairman of the Committee on the District of Columbia, my colleague, [Mr. MORRILL,] told me expressly when he was in the Senate the other day, that this was done without his knowledge, without his assent, and that he did not think it necessary or advisable to make the clerk of the Committee on the District of Columbia a permanent clerk, nor did he think it advisable in the other instance. When such a motion is brought in here, and the chairman of one of the committees concerned, which certainly has considerable business, deems this an unnecessary expense, I think the least we can do is to refer the resolution to the Committee on Contingent Expenses to examine into the matter. You see to what it leads. My honorable friend from Michigan moves to add the clerk of the Committee on Commerce, and somebody else will move to add the clerk of some other committee; and so it will go. I think the matter had better be sent to the appropriate committee, to be carefully examined.

Mr. RIDDLE. I merely wish to say one word in reply to the Senator from Maine, with regard to the clerk of the Committee on the District of Columbia. If there be a clerk connected with any committee, other than the Committee on Finance, who should be a permanent officer, it is the clerk of the Committee on the District of Columbia. That committee has, this session, had over one hundred bills before it. The clerk has been compelled to be present every day of the week. He is obliged to be familiar with the laws of the country and the regulations of the District. If you are to pick up a clerk to that committee for three months during the short session, for the period allowed during that time, you will have to take a man from this neighborhood, and you cannot expect to get a man who is experienced and able to discharge the duties. I have served upon that committee, and I know the duties the clerk has to discharge; and if the chairman of the committee were present he would indorse every word that I say on the subject.

Mr. FESSENDEN. I can only say in reply, that the chairman of that committee, who certainly ought to know as much about the labors of it as anybody, because I believe the labor of a committee generally falls on the chairman, expressly stated to me that the resolution was moved without his knowledge or assent, and that he did not consider it necessary or advisable to make the clerk to that committee permanent; that he thought the clerk should only be continued during the time Congress was in session; that to make him a permanent clerk would be a useless expense from which no good would come. This was substantially his statement to me and to others.

Mr. CHANDLER. I hope the reference will be made, for there is an evident injustice being done here to clerks of committees in this body. It may be that the Committee on Finance require a permanent clerk. I presume they do; but I think there is no other committee of this body that requires a permanent clerk, and I hope that if the subject is referred to the Committee on Contingent Expenses they will regulate the whole matter and report a proper provision on the subject. Now, in regard to the labors of clerks I am sure there is not a clerk of any committee of this body that has during the present session performed one half the labor that the clerk of the Committee on Commerce has performed; and if there is any committee, beside the Committee on Finance, that requires a permanent clerk, it is the Committee on Commerce. But I am willing that the reference should be made, and I hope the Committee on Contingent Expenses will give the subject a thorough investigation, and correct the wrong which is being done.

Mr. POMEROY. I suppose all that the Senator from Delaware has said in reference to the Committee on the District of Columbia might be said in reference to the Committee on Public Lands, but we have not thought of asking for any compensation for our clerk during the recess. I prefer that this matter should go to the Committee on Contingent Expenses. If they report a bill including all the clerks, it will be very well. If not, I think we had better let the matter remain as it is.

Mr. GRIMES. I apprehend that every chairman of a committee would say about the same thing in regard to the services performed by his clerk. I happen to have been for about four years, I believe, prior to the last session of the last Congress, chairman of the Committee on the District of Columbia, and I know something of the duties required to be performed by the clerk of that committee, and I think I have a tolerable apprehension as to the duties required of each of the clerks named in the resolution. It seems to me that in order to prevent any misunderstanding, any invidious comparisons here in the face of the Senate, or any ill feeling among the clerks or among the chairmen of the various committees, the easiest and best and most proper way to dispose of this matter is to refer the resolution to the Committee on Contingent Expenses, and let that committee investigate the whole subject and report to the Senate.

Mr. DAVIS. I believe the Committee on the District of Columbia have unnecessarily and unwisely added nine tenths to their labors this session, and my own judgment would be for disallowing a clerk to that committee above all the committees of the Senate. If in that way we could stifle the mischief that they have been working, it would be a God-send to the country.

Mr. SPRAGUE. I must continue to object, though perhaps the objection will be in vain, to the disposition proposed to be made of this resolution. The Senator from Iowa is disposed to postpone this matter, as he is a great many others, as we found yesterday. I desire, however, to say one word in reference to the remark made by the Senator from Maine with regard to his colleague. I did not sanction that portion of the resolution with regard to the Committee on the District of Columbia unadvisedly. Before introducing the measure I applied to the chairman of that committee, and after it was introduced I had a conversation with him on the subject, and I got no such impression as that referred to and expressed by the honorable member from Maine.

Here are committees of this body employing a clerk during the long session of seven months. During that time he gets fully instructed as to his duty, and by the time Congress adjourns in July or August he is very well qualified. Then he goes out, and the question is whether you can get him at the short session. It is evidently important that persons of experience should occupy these positions. If the clerks are changed every session, I think you cannot get proper, judicious legislation based upon the information that a competent clerk will obtain for a committee. Almost every messenger in this whole Government is continued throughout the year. The clerks in most of the subordinate departments of your Government are continued throughout the year, with a pay equal to that received by these men, who are supposed to be, and whom it is desired should be, competent to discharge the duties required of them. The Committee on Finance would hardly be willing to commit its duties to an un instructed man as clerk. It would be difficult to find in the whole range of its vision one who could satisfactorily and ably discharge the great trusts necessarily reposed in the clerk of that committee. The same argument applies to other committees. I hope the resolution will not be referred.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The question is on the motion to refer this resolution to the Committee to Audit and Control the Contingent Expenses of the Senate.

The motion was agreed to—ayes twenty-three, nays not counted.

MESSAGE FROM THE HOUSE.

A message from the House of Representatives, by Mr. McPHERSON, its Clerk, announced that the House of Representatives had passed, without amendment, the bill (S. No. 114) for the relief of A. T. Spencer and Gurdon S. Hubbard.

The message further announced that the House of Representatives had concurred in the amendments of the Senate to the following bills:

A bill (H. R. No. 702) granting a pension to Mrs. Charlotte E. Reed;

A bill (H. R. No. 739) for the relief of Samantha Rader;

A bill (H. R. No. 741) granting a pension to Jonathan W. Beach; and

A bill (H. R. No. 742) for the relief of the minor children of Salvador Accardi, deceased.

ENROLLED BILLS SIGNED.

The message further announced that the Speaker of the House had signed the following enrolled bills; and they were thereupon signed by the President pro tempore:

A bill (H. R. No. 456) to extend the benefits of section four of an act making appropriations for the support of the Army for the year ending June 30, 1866, approved March 8, 1865;

A bill (H. R. No. 513) to reduce internal taxation and to amend an act entitled "An act to provide internal revenue to support the Government, to pay interest on the public debt, and for other purposes," approved June 30, 1864, and acts amendatory thereof;

A bill (H. R. No. 611) to provide for making the town of Whitehall, New York, a port of delivery; and

A bill (H. R. No. 726) to extend to certain persons the privilege of admission in certain cases to the United States Government Asylum for the Insane.

RECORD OF A COURT OF INQUIRY.

Mr. WILSON. I offer the following resolution, and ask for its present consideration:

Resolved, That the President of the United States be requested to furnish to the Senate the record of the court of inquiry upon the murder of twenty-three United States soldiers at Kingston, North Carolina, in 1864, by the rebel Generals Hoke and Pickett, under the alleged charge of being deserters from the rebel army, together with the proceedings of the said court of inquiry, and the action, if any, taken thereon.

Mr. FESSENDEN. I should like to hear the reasons for that resolution. I do not know what necessity there is for it. To copy the record will create a great deal of writing; it is a large record, I suppose.

Mr. JOHNSON. I object to considering the resolution now.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. Objection being made, the resolution lies over under the rule.

WHITE BLUFFS AND HELENA ROAD.

Mr. NESMITH. I move to take up for consideration Senate bill No. 332.

The motion was agreed to; and the bill (S. No. 332) to provide for the construction of a wagon road from White Bluffs, in Washington Territory, to Helena, in Montana Territory, was considered by the Senate as in Committee of the Whole.

The Committee on Military Affairs and the Militia had reported an amendment, which was after the word "dollars," in line three of section two, to insert the words "or so much thereof as may be necessary."

The amendment was agreed to.

Mr. GRIMES. I now call for the reading of the bill as amended.

The Secretary read as follows:

Be it enacted, &c., That the Secretary of the Interior be, and he is hereby, authorized and empowered to survey, locate, and construct a wagon road from White Bluffs, in Washington Territory, via Pend Oreille lake, to Helena, in Montana Territory.

Sec. 2. And be it further enacted, That to enable the Secretary of the Interior to carry out the provisions of the foregoing section, the sum of $100,000, or so much thereof as may be necessary, be, and the same is hereby, appropriated out of any money in the Treasury not otherwise appropriated.

Mr. POMEROY. What committee reports this bill?

Mr. NESMITH. The Committee on Military Affairs.

Mr. POMEROY. Then I suppose it is a military road; but the bill does not say so. It says "a wagon road."

Mr. GRIMES. I inquire if this has been estimated for by the War Department, or any recommendation made for such an appropriation.

Mr. NESMITH. I will state that there has been no estimate from the War Department.

This is simply a bill providing for the construction of a wagon road to connect the waters of the Missouri and the Columbia, four hundred and eighty miles across. The country is opening up now, and is of great mineral importance. This road is important in a military point of view. It is the nearest and most direct route connecting the waters of those two great rivers, the Missouri and the Columbia. Pend Oreille lake, which forms a portion of the line of communication by this route, has a navigation of sixty-five miles. This route is regarded by all military men in that country as of the greatest importance, and it is intended particularly to open up the commerce of that vast region. It is substantially such a bill as was passed last year opening up a road from Virginia City to Lewiston.

Mr. FESSENDEN. Is there any written report accompanying the bill?

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Chair is advised that there is not.

Mr. FESSENDEN. I hope, then, it will be postponed until we can have a regular report on it. Has there been any survey of the route?

Mr. NESMITH. There has been no survey of it by the Government for a wagon road.

Mr. FESSENDEN. Then the case is this: we have a general bill presented appropriating $100,000 for the purpose of hunting up and discovering a route in the first place; with no estimate of what it will cost; no knowledge on the subject; no report as to the facts. I object entirely to this mode of legislation, and I wish to warn the Senate against it. We ought to proceed more understandingly with reference to these things. This idea of making a loose appropriation to satisfy everybody that asks for one, upon a mere statement of some member of a committee as to the facts, without any estimates and without any survey, is, to my mind, very unwise and very dangerous.

I do not know but that I might be in favor of an appropriation for this purpose if we had the proper information. I cannot tell what I should do on that point until I know something about the facts; but, sir, we have got into a habit, which is a very recent one here, of recommending these things loosely. They are brought in by a committee, with no report on the subject, no preliminary information, appropriating large sums of money to begin a thing, when we do not know what it is to cost in the end, and we act upon it because some member of the committee says that, on the whole, he thinks it is best. It is a very loose mode of legislation, and I object to it. I think the bill ought to lie over until the subject has been properly reported upon by a committee.

Mr. NESMITH. Mr. President, I will state that there has been no survey made of this route for a wagon road, but it is substantially the route which was surveyed by Governor Stevens in 1853 for a railroad route. The country is well known, and the War Department has all the information in relation to it. On the eastern side there is navigation to Fort Benton, and a very great commerce is carried on between that and the rivers on the other side of the mountains. There are four hundred and eighty miles of intervening country through which there is no regular road. It is a very rich mining country. The people on the Pacific side are using every means to send supplies there, but they are unaided by the Government; the matter is dependent entirely on private enterprise. There are now steamers on the upper Columbia and on the Pend Oreille lake, which embraces some sixty-five miles of this distance of four hundred and eighty. Of course there has been no appropriation made providing for a survey with reference to this particular wagon route, but there was an appropriation made for a survey of a railroad route, and this route was surveyed for that purpose by Governor Stevens. The reports on file show the feasibility of the construction of such a road. I think the commercial and mining interests of that country are such that the Government should do something to facilitate its means of transportation for the miners who are now so rapidly developing it. It cannot all be left to private enterprise. It is pretty hard for men to engage in the production of the precious metals in a country so remote as that, with so many obstacles to overcome, entirely unaided.

I know that the objection which the Senator from Maine makes is the same that he has made to almost every appropriation for the development of the country on that side. No matter whether an appropriation is asked for a mint or a custom-house or a railroad or a wagon road or anything else, the same objection is constantly and continually made. I think the people of that country who open up its resources are entitled to some consideration. There are now within the boundaries of the country through which this road is proposed to pass fifty to sixty thousand people engaged in mining, and I think that the superior advantage those people would derive from this road for the transportation of the necessary supplies and the development of that country would in one year more than compensate the Government for its outlay. I hope, therefore, the Senate will consent to appropriate so small a sum as is proposed for so great and beneficial an object.

Mr. FESSENDEN. This talk about objection being made to every appropriation that is proposed for that section of country is very rash. Examination will show that since that region has been a part of the United States there is no section of the country to which so much money has been appropriated. My friend from Maryland [Mr. JOHNSON] suggests to me that it has received more than all other sections combined. I do not go so far as that; but there is not a section of the country that compares with the Pacific coast in the amount of appropriations which have been made for the accommodation of travel and for all other matters connected with the country. Any charge, therefore, with relation to that matter, is most unjust to Congress.

Now, sir, what is it that I ask in reference to this bill? I do not say that I shall be opposed to it if the necessity for the appropriation is shown; but what I contend for is that this loose method of legislation is most unwise and most dangerous. Let us have the statistics. It is not enough for a Senator from that section of the country, however high he may stand and whatever credit we may give to his statements, to get up here, and for us, on his single statement of what he thinks with reference to such a matter, to pass a bill appropriating $100,000 to begin a work the final cost of which we do not know. What I want is that there shall be a report on the subject from a committee, that we may rely upon a report made after a thorough investigation of the question. In the first place, is this a military road? The Senator does not pretend that it is a military road, properly so called. It is not called a military road; it is called a wagon road; and yet the Committee on Military Affairs, of which the honorable Senator from Oregon is a member, and an influential member, reports the bill. With the vast amount of business that committee has in regard to military affairs, it must be, perhaps, a little difficult to suppose that they can investigate all questions of this kind which do not properly belong to them.

Then we have no report, we have no recommendation from the Department on the subject; we have no pointing out of the route; we have no survey; we have no statistics; we have no calculations upon which to proceed. We are called upon to begin a work of this kind on the mere statement of a Senator, coming from a committee. Now, sir, whatever credibility I give to that—and I give to the Senator from Oregon all that I would to any other member of the Senate, and I repose confidence in all his statements—this kind of legislation is loose and dangerous, and ought not to be indulged in by the Senate. It is a new practice which has grown up, I am sorry to say, within a very few years, and it does Congress no credit whatever. We ought to know more about these things before we commence works of this description and appropriate these large sums of money for them.

Mr. NESMITH. It is not always convenient for us, living on the Pacific coast, so very remote from the seat of Government—and particularly does this apply to the country where the road is—to get estimates from the Department for such works. The Senator from Maine controverts the proposition which I made in regard to the amount of money that has been expended in that country, and in regard to his opposition to appropriations for it. I desire to say, for the information of the Senator, that I think $40,000, or at most $60,000, is all that has ever been appropriated for the development of that region of country to which this bill refers. In relation to his opposition to these appropriations, I will only say that the first measure I ever introduced into Congress for the benefit of that region of country was a small appropriation to enable the Indian department to extinguish the Indian title to the Nez Percés country. That was fought here for two days with great opposition by the Senator from Maine. The next was an appropriation of the small amount of $45,000 for the improvement of the Columbia river, and that met the same opposition. The next was a proposition to establish a mint in Oregon. The history of that question is pretty well known, and the Senate remembers the pertinacity with which the Senator from Maine, the chairman of the Committee on Finance, opposed that bill. There appears to be a continual effort on his part to throw some obstacle in the way of the passage of all my measures for the interest of that country. I do not blame him particularly. He regards it as his duty as chairman of the Committee on Finance to guard and protect the Treasury. I have no particular objection to that; but I think it is a little invidious when that opposition is made to every measure coming from that particular country, and does not apply to measures coming from other sections.

Mr. GRIMES. I must be permitted to say that I think the remarks of the Senator from Oregon in relation to the Senator from Maine are not justified by anything that has occurred since I have been a member of this body. I am not aware that that Senator has ever interfered with the interests of the people of Oregon or any of the States on the Pacific coast in any respect; no more so, at any rate, than I believe he was not only justified but required to interfere.

Now, sir, look at this case. The Senator from Oregon undertakes to create an impression that there has been an attempt to do some injustice to the State of Oregon or to Washington Territory. Why, sir, I should expect the Senator from Maine, or somebody else to interpose an objection if I were attempting to pass through a bill under such circumstances as these. What is this? A military road? No. How came it before the Committee on Military Affairs? Who sent it there? What right had the Committee on Military Affairs to take jurisdiction of it? Has it been recommended by the Secretary of War? Not at all.

Mr. NESMITH. The Senate sent it there.

Mr. GRIMES. The Senate sent it there, I suppose at the instance of the Senator from Oregon. Who knows anything about this matter but the Senator from Oregon? Are we, the representatives of the people, men appointed and sworn to protect the Treasury of the country, to be assailed as being derelict in our duty and as attempting to injure the interests of any State or section?

Mr. NESMITH. With the permission of the Senator from Iowa I will say that I have assailed no person; I merely alluded to the circumstance that the Senator from Maine always opposed these appropriations. I did not assail anybody, not even the Senator from Maine. I said he supposed it to be his duty to protect the Treasury. I did not make any complaint of him or assail him; and I think the Senator from Iowa ought not to use the word "assail" in that connection.

Mr. GRIMES. I do not know what a Senator means when he gets up here and says that a particular Senator is invariably opposing all measures that are introduced for the benefit of a particular section of the country, unless it be that he assails that Senator for doing so. I do not mean by using the word "assail" to say that the Senator from Oregon uses epithets that are improper for a gentleman or a Senator to use. I simply mean that he attacked the Senator from Maine, and complained of him because he was unwilling that this bill should pass without challenge. Now, sir, I unite with the Senator from Maine in saying that this bill ought not to pass without investigation.

I should like to know how it happens that such a large appropriation as this is recommended by the Military Committee for the construction of a wagon road, the road not being a military road, not recommended by the War Department, not recommended by any of the Army officers who have been in that section of the country and who have been exploring for wagon roads, so far as I know. If Lieutenant Mullan or any of the officers who have been engaged in that kind of business in that section of the country has recommended the construction of such a road as this, let it be based upon a report, and let us be justified in our own eyes and in the eyes of the country in appropriating $100,000 in a gross sum like this. I have no objection to the people of Oregon and Washington having all the roads that may be necessary, although I know very well, and I say it in no improper sense, that these wagon road appropriations as they used to be expended when my State was a Territory are mere jobs; the roads do not amount to anything when they are constructed. But if it be necessary that this wagon road should be constructed, I will vote the money most freely; but I should really like to know why I do it; and I should like to put something on the record to satisfy myself, when I come to review my action next year or the year after, that I was acting discreetly and wisely and judiciously when I voted for the appropriation of $100,000 for this purpose. We have got no report in this case; the bill comes from a committee that had no jurisdiction of the subject; there has been no recommendation from the Interior Department or the War Department in favor of it; nobody, it seems, knew anything about this bill until it came up this morning, unless it be some members of the Military Committee.

Mr. WILLIAMS. Mr. President—
The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The morning hour having expired, it becomes the duty of the Chair to call up the unfinished business of yesterday.

NIAGARA SHIP-CANAL.

The Senate, as in Committee of the Whole, resumed the consideration of the bill (H. R. No. 344) to incorporate the Niagara Ship-Canal Company.

Mr. CONNESS. We have been a great many days upon this bill, and I do not see but that it is going to occupy the whole time of the Senate during the remainder of the session in discussion. If we can come to a vote upon it, I shall be glad for one, because I am waiting patiently for a chance to get some business done. I do not know how many days this bill has occupied. I shall vote for its postponement unless we can get a vote upon it. That is all I mean to say about it.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The pending question is on the motion of the Senator from New York, [Mr. MORGAN,] that this bill be postponed until the second Tuesday in December next.

Mr. HARRIS. Mr. President, I hope the motion will prevail. I do not now question the power of Congress to pass such a law; I do not question at present the power of Congress to create a corporation with authority to construct such a canal; nor will I now question the expediency of the work. What I do question now is the expediency of passing such a law as this at this time. There is no reason why such a measure as this should be forced upon the State of New York at this time. It is novel in its character and very important in its consequences. I say there is no necessity for it. At present, it cannot with truth be denied that the means of communication through the State of New York are sufficient for all the necessities of the West. New York has recently enlarged her canal threefold, and it is asserted by those best qualified to judge, who have the most competent knowledge on the subject, that the Erie canal is capable of transporting now one million tons of produce from the West beyond any quantity that has been presented for transportation in any one year. I believe it. That the time may come when greater facilities will be demanded I do not doubt; but it has not yet come, and there is, therefore, no necessity for passing this measure at this hour.

It would be, in my judgment, ungrateful and unkind in the West to force upon the State of New York, at this time, the construction of this work by a private corporation. Let New York have an opportunity to see what she will do. Let this question once more come before the Legislature of New York. New York has been generous, as was conceded by the Senator from Wisconsin yesterday, generous toward the West. A little more than forty years ago, when that State entered upon her great system of internal improvements, there were six or seven great States lying along on the northern lakes like so many sleeping giants, unconscious of their power and strength. It was the Erie canal and the construction of this great system of internal improvements that revealed their power more than anything else, far more than anything else. It was this that showed them their imperial strength.

Now, sir, is it wise for these States whose powers and resources have been thus revealed and developed by the New York system of improvements, to force this measure upon the State of New York? Let New York have an opportunity of doing this work herself, or, as she now contemplates, enlarging still further her canal. It is no light thing to create a corporation and send that corporation into the State of New York to occupy her soil without her consent or permission, and to construct this work there on her soil and territory, giving her no sort of control over it. It is unprecedented; and though Congress may have the power, it is not wise in a time like this to exert that power.

Mr. HOWE. Will the Senator allow me to remark that the bill as it stands proposes to consult New York?

Mr. HARRIS. I am aware of that; but I am also aware of the fact that an effort will be made by the gentleman from Wisconsin, who has charge of the measure, to strike that out before it is put upon its passage.

Mr. HOWE. The Senator will allow me to say that he cannot be aware of any such thing. I made no such effort, and propose none.

Mr. HARRIS. Certainly the purpose was avowed by some one yesterday.

Mr. HOWE. Not by me.

Mr. HARRIS. The State of New York some forty-odd years ago entered upon this system of internal improvements. She has expended upon it, including the original cost of the work, upon the enlargement of the Erie canal, which cost $31,000,000, very recently completed, and including also interest, expenses of repairs, and superintendence, $166,000,000. She has received in tolls from these works a little more than half that amount, not over $90,000,000. Seventy-five million dollars have been provided for otherwise by the State. She has devoted to it her permanent revenues. She has taxed her people largely and liberally for this work. Within the very last year she has taxed her people about a million dollars for this work. We have not therefore exacted largely from the western States in tolls upon these canals. The State has put the toll as low as it was possible. When we commenced the work, we applied to Congress to aid us; but then it was unconstitutional to aid a work of internal improvement, and we were obliged to undertake it at that early day single-handed and alone, and we have gone on with it. Now, it seems to me it is a little ungracious to send this foreign corporation there to occupy our soil without our consent. Under these circumstances, is it too much for New York to ask that this thing may be suspended for a few months, that she may see what she can do in the case, that this corporation may not now be created and vested with this power irrevocably to go on and occupy the soil and territory of New York and to construct this work under the circumstances I have mentioned?

Again, sir, New York is proud of these improvements. She has a right to be. Her people are sensitive in relation to them. And now for Congress to pass this bill and send this corporation there with the powers that it is proposed to confer upon them will inevitably create great excitement and agitation; and this is certainly not the best time to excite and agitate the people. We have questions of excitement and agitation quite enough on our hands now. I hope, therefore, for this reason, that the Senate will postpone the consideration of this bill.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. Is the Senate ready for the question on the motion of the Senator from New York [Mr. MORGAN] to postpone the further consideration of this bill until the second Tuesday in December next?

Mr. HOWE. On that question I ask for the yeas and nays.

The yeas and nays were ordered.

Mr. TRUMBULL. Mr. President, I trust that this motion will not prevail, and particularly at this stage of the bill. The friends of the bill have not yet been able to perfect it; and while it is in Committee of the Whole, not yet reported to the Senate, the Senator from New York moves to postpone it until the next session. I think we ought to be permitted to get the bill in as perfect a shape as we can, coming from a committee of this body, and an important provision of it not yet having been voted upon in the Senate, before this motion is made.

But, sir, I trust that it will not be postponed at any rate. If I can get the attention of Senators for a few moments I should like to answer some of the objections made to this bill, founded, I think, not in fact. The Senator from Maine [Mr. FESSENDEN] objected, or raised a question about its constitutionality. The Senator from Iowa [Mr. GRIMES] objects to this work being done by a company, and the objection is made that this is a novel proceeding; the authority of Congress is called in question. I think if the bill is looked at and its provisions understood, there will be no difficulty on that subject. It is no new thing in this Government, certainly, for the Government to undertake internal improvements of a national character. We have appropriated money for years to improve the Mississippi river; and what is this but making a canal around the falls of Niagara, on one of the greatest, I may say the greatest thoroughfare in this nation—a thoroughfare over which hundreds of millions of commerce passes annually—the most important in the nation? Have we not authority to canal around those falls? We have appropriated at this very session of Congress money to improve the Mississippi river at the Rock Island rapids. Does anybody doubt the authority, if it shall be thought most advisable, to make that improvement by canalling around the rapids at Rock Island? If we have authority to make the improvement, then, sir, we have authority to make that improvement in the most effective and judicious manner.

But it is objected that a company is going to do this. Who made the improvements on the Ohio river, at the falls of the Ohio, at Louisville? How was that improvement made? There is a canal around the falls of the Ohio, and vessels are locked around those falls. Who did that? It was not done directly by the Government of the United States, though the Government of the United States invested a large sum of money in that improvement; and how?

They took stock in the Louisville and Portland canal under an act of Congress passed as long ago as 1826. The Secretary of the Treasury was authorized and directed to subscribe for, and purchase, in the name and for the use of the United States, not exceeding one thousand shares of the capital stock of the Louisville and Portland Canal Company. We, at a subsequent period, purchased additional stock in the Louisville and Portland Canal Company; and that improvement was made, and has been in use for years. How does that differ in principle, I should like to know, from the improvement proposed to be made around the falls of Niagara? It is true, the Louisville and Portland Canal Company was not chartered by Congress; but it will not be doubted that Congress has authority to create a corporation. We have done that often; and if we could make use of a corporation created by the Legislature of Kentucky or of Ohio or of another State, and could become a joint stockholder with the corporation thus created, for the purpose of making an improvement around the falls of the Ohio, may we not become a joint stockholder with a company which we ourselves create for the purpose of making the improvement around the falls of Niagara?

But it is complained that we have no estimate; that this improvement is to cost a great many million dollars. Why, sir, the improvement is to be undertaken by the company, not by the Government of the United States; and by the provisions of this bill, until the company shall have expended $2,000,000 the Government of the United States furnishes nothing. Is there no guarantee in this for the safety of the Government? Again, the Government of the United States does not propose to do this work; it is a mere loan to this company. By the provisions of the bill every dollar loaned to the company is to be returned again to the Government of the United States; the company is to make this first expenditure of $2,000,000 before it receives anything, and then from that time forward the company is to expend more money than it borrows from the Government of the United States. When it spends $300,000, I think, by this bill it is permitted to borrow $200,000 from the Government of the United States. After it has expended the first $2,000,000, then it must go on and spend three fifths of all the money subsequently that is used in making the improvement; the Government of the United States furnishing about two fifths, and that on a loan. That is this bill. Can there be any danger to the finances of the country in passing such a bill? But the Senator from New York tells us that we must wait, wait upon New York. He tells us that the Erie canal has capacity to carry a thousand tons—

Mr. HARRIS. A million tons.

Mr. TRUMBULL. A million tons of produce more than it has ever taken before. That may be true, if you could use it to its utmost capacity all the time; but how often is it blocked up, so that there is delay? Again, let me say to the Senator from New York that the great amount of commerce that is to pass from the West to the East and from the East to the West does not want to be dependent upon the Erie canal and the rates of toll that may be established upon it.

Mr. GRIMES. Will the Senator allow me to ask him how produce is going to get out of Lake Ontario when it gets through this Niagara ship-canal, except by the New York Central railroad?

Mr. HARRIS. They propose to take it down through the St. Lawrence.

Mr. TRUMBULL. We will take it every way. We will avail ourselves of every avenue to the ocean. That is what the people of my State and the people of the State of Iowa want. It is to open other avenues, increase the facilities and cheapen the expense of transportation. That is what we are after. We want to cheapen the expense, so that the state of things spoken of by the Senator from Ohio [Mr. WADE] the other day—an extreme case, which has very seldom occurred—where corn was burnt for fuel, will not arise again. A wrong impression goes out to the country and to the world by these statements about burning corn for fuel. Such a case may have occurred, a solitary case; but, sir, my State is the greatest corn-growing State in the Union, and I never saw a fire made of corn. I have never seen corn used for fuel, although I doubt not there may have been, under some peculiar circumstances when there was inconvenience, perhaps, in procuring firewood, an instance where corn may have been used in that way. In all my residence in the State and acquaintance in it, however, I never knew or had brought to my knowledge a case of the kind. But, sir, I have seen corn sold out of the wagon in Illinois and delivered at the stable at eight cents a bushel; and during the last season in many portions of my State it has sold for fifteen cents a bushel.

Now, sir, we are interested, and deeply interested, in multiplying these ways to the ocean. We think it will aid us to some extent to have a canal around the falls of Niagara. It is a great national work. It is put upon the ground of the authority of the Federal Government to make an improvement which is national. Even John C. Calhoun, the strictest of the constructionists of the South, admitted, at a convention held on the Mississippi river at Memphis some years ago, that the Mississippi river was an inland sea, and that the Federal Government had authority to improve it because it was a great inland sea. It is no more a great inland sea than the great lakes are; and the hundreds of millions of commerce that pass through these lakes and seek an outlet to the ocean should have every facility afforded that the Government can give for cheap transportation.

Now, sir, I trust that we shall not postpone this measure. It is one in which my constituents take a great interest. It involves no immediate drain upon the Treasury. Not a dollar is to be called for, be it remembered, until this company shall have expended $2,000,000, and then not a dollar until the company shall expend three dollars for every two which it borrows of the Government. Under these circumstances I trust that the Senate will consent at least to let us perfect this bill, and when perfected I hope it will consent to pass it.

Mr. HOWE. I did not mean to say anything more in the progress of this debate. I only rise now to correct the figures submitted to the Senate just now by the Senator from New York. He states the expenditures by the State of New York for the construction of her canals—not in the construction of the Erie canal, but of all her canals—at about one hundred and sixty million dollars, of which he says only about ninety millions have been refunded, leaving a debt on the State of about seventy millions.

Mr. HARRIS. No, sir; I stated that the expenditures upon the canals were $166,000,000; that about ninety millions had been received back from tolls; that the other seventy-five or seventy-six millions had been provided for otherwise, of which, however, there is a debt of only thirty-three millions on the State. The rest has been paid by the State from other sources.

Mr. HOWE. The report of the canal board made on the 12th of March, 1866, states the account somewhat differently. It is here stated that all the canals of the State have cost in construction, land damages, superintendence, repairs, interest on loans, and everything else, in round numbers, about one hundred million dollars, instead of one hundred and sixty-six millions, and have paid back between eighty-three and eighty-four millions, leaving a debt upon them to-day of about sixteen millions. The report also states:

"No direct taxation upon the people on account of the canals remains to-day unpaid, but on the contrary the treasury of the State has been reimbursed principal and interest, in full, and has now in its coffers nearly one million dollars from the canal revenue in advance of any taxation for canal purposes. The Erie canal account shows the gratifying result of a credit of over nine million dollars above all cost to the State."

Thus stands the account with the State of New York. With the exception of the Erie canal, all the rest of the canals built under her system are for local uses, merely for the benefit of the State, and are in no way chargeable to the nation. The question was asked; a moment since, and it is the only other question that I propose to allude to, how is the commerce which is to pass from Lake Erie into Lake Ontario through this canal to be taken out of Lake Ontario? Several ways. The Senator from New York suggested that it can go down the St. Lawrence; and go out of the St. Lawrence. It can go down the St. Lawrence to Ogdensburg, where it will find one line of railway. It can leave Lake Ontario at Oswego, either by a canal or by a railroad connecting with the Erie canal or with the Central railroad. But what can be done beyond all this, and what I want to say to the Senate must and will be done, is to construct between Lake Ontario and the Hudson river a new and a larger water communication over which commerce can be moved by steam. This is one step toward it. This will overcome one half of the distance of the Erie canal. Your commerce that goes by the canal from Lake Ontario will only have about half the distance to be drawn by horses that it now has.

Mr. HENDRICKS. Mr. President, there are several reasons why I shall vote for the postponement of the consideration of this bill until the next session of Congress. In the first place, if it be necessary to pass the bill at all, the work need not be seriously delayed by its passage at the next session. It is not probable that the work will be commenced during this summer; and if the bill shall pass at an early day during the next session, the company could be organized and the organization could be so completed so that the work could commence in the spring. Therefore I think that the work itself, if ever so desirable, is not delayed seriously by the postponement of the consideration of the bill.

But, sir, I am not willing to vote for a bill creating a corporation, with great powers and large capital, to exercise its powers in the State of New York against the will of that State, without a very full consideration of the measure—a consideration which, I think, during the hot days of the summer we ought not to be called upon to give. The State of New York with great force says to us that she has invested very many millions of dollars in the construction of a canal, one of the greatest works of the world, which accommodates to a very large extent the commerce of the western States. She has made this investment, and we ought to consider very carefully, as a matter of justice and right to that State, before we establish a competing line or channel of commerce under the charge of a corporation created by an act of Congress. The Senator from Illinois has said that Congress has already appropriated money to a work of internal improvement to be used by a corporation. I ask that Senator if Congress incorporated the company that had charge of the work for the construction of the canal at the falls of the Ohio. I do not so understand. Congress made an appropriation to that work; but I do not recollect that Congress incorporated a company to improve the falls of the Ohio.

Mr. TRUMBULL. I stated distinctly that it did not; and I asked the question, if the Congress of the United States had a right to become a stockholder in a corporation created by a State to make a national improvement, had it not a right to create the corporation itself?

Mr. HENDRICKS. I will not discuss the question that the Senator presents; but in the case to which he refers the State of Kentucky was very anxious for that improvement; the State of Indiana, that occupied the opposite bank of the Ohio, was very anxious for that improvement; the State of Kentucky expressed that desire by incorporating the company, so that the expenditure of the money by the General Government was not only with the consent but at the most earnest desire of the two States interested in the work. Now, we have the case of a great State, having invested a very large sum of money in the construction of a magnificent work to aid the commerce of the western States, objecting to the immediate passage of this bill.

Mr. TRUMBULL. If the Senator has read the bill, he will see that it contains a provision—I am opposed to the provision, but it is in the bill as it stands—that the work is not to be done without the consent of the State of New York.

Mr. HENDRICKS. I understand that very well; but the State of New York now, by her Senators here, objects to the consideration of this bill at the present time. Is it not fair to give to the Senators from New York an opportunity to consult with their constituents upon so important a work to her interest? What will be the effect of the passage of this bill should it go before the Legislature of New York? The appeal will be made there to the members that Congress has proposed to invest so much money within her limits to organize a company of this power, and the appeal will be made to the members of the Legislature to grant this privilege. The Senators from New York have asked that before this is done they shall have an opportunity, during the coming months, to consult their constituents. It seems to me that when the extraordinary proposition is before us, that Congress shall create a corporation to exercise its powers entirely within a State—not at all within the District of Columbia, not at all within any of those localities over which Congress has exclusive jurisdiction, but entirely within a State—and the Senators from that State are asking us to postpone its consideration for a few months, it ought not to be a debatable question. Northern Indiana is interested in this work; I know it very well; but northern Indiana will not ask an act of injustice to New York; nor will she ask that Congress shall do that which the Constitution forbids. I do not now propose to discuss that question, nor am I prepared to say that I have a decided opinion upon it. My impression is, however, that Congress has not the power to do what it never yet has done, establish a corporation to do a thing within a State exclusively.

The Senator from Illinois has referred to the condition of our markets; to the fact that corn, in southern Indiana and southern Illinois, during the past year, has been worth but fifteen cents a bushel. I have seen the statement that in his State corn has been used for fuel. I know nothing about it except as it is stated in the newspapers. If that be the condition of our commerce in southern Indiana and southern Illinois, what is the remedy? Not a ship canal around the falls of Niagara. That may be useful; but our great remedy is the restoration of commerce and trade with the southern States. Let us open up the rivers again; let there be a prosperous people, a money-making people along the shores of the Mississippi river and along the Gulf coast; let us find our ready and our natural market in the southern States, and corn will no longer be fifteen cents a bushel. I believe the Senator from Illinois was one of the Senators who voted to put a tax of sixteen hundred per cent. upon corn when it is reduced to a commodity that can be shipped to market. Corn that is worth, he says, but fifteen cents a bushel, one bushel making four gallons of whisky, has to pay, in that State, eight dollars of tax; and that Senator favored that oppressive measure against the interest of his own State and of the State that I represent.

Mr. TRUMBULL. I presume that the Senator from Indiana, with his usual fairness, for I think he means to state the position of Senators fairly, would not intentionally misrepresent any action which I have taken in this body. Sir, I opposed with all the power I was capable of, not a tax on whisky, but any such tax as two dollars a gallon on whisky. I never voted for it. I voted against it and talked against it; and I believe to-day that it is a most injurious tax, not only to the corn-grower, but to the revenue of this country. I think that taxing the article of corn a thousand per cent., or sixteen hundred per cent., as the Senator from Indiana has it, is injurious in every aspect of the case. We have got no such revenue from whisky as we should have got with a reasonable tax upon it. We needed a revenue; I was willing that my constituents, with others, should submit to the payment of a revenue; but I never consented, so far as I was concerned, to the imposition of any such unequal and unjust tax, as I believe that to be which is imposed by the law as it has existed for the last year upon whisky.

Mr. HENDRICKS. I am very glad that the Senator has made the explanation, because I was misled in some way in regard to his course on that question. I had the impression that he had favored that high tax. Perhaps that impression grew out of the fact that the Senator favored a tax upon whisky on hand. I may have confused the two questions; and I am glad to hear the Senator speak as he now does upon that most unjust measure toward the State which he represents and toward the State which I represent.

But, Mr. President, I will ask the Senator from Illinois, what was his course the other day when it was proposed to tax cotton? The Senator cannot say that the interest of the Northwest is identified with that question. We want cotton to be raised on the shores of the Mississippi and the Gulf coast. We want it to be produced in the largest quantity, and to be sold to a profitable market, so that the people of the southern States may be able to buy our produce, which we want to sell. We do not want the people of the southern States to go into the production of corn and the articles which we produce in the Northwest, but we want them to divert their capital and their labor to the production of that which does not come in competition with our capital or with our labor. Our natural market is down the Ohio and the Mississippi rivers. Restore the relations between these States; give the southern States a representation in Congress; let this whole country once more feel that the States are united for every purpose; let fair legislation characterize everything that Congress does toward every section of the country, and we shall soon find our natural and our lucrative market. Open up the canals and give us an eastern market. What is that worth to us compared with our market down the river? What is that worth to us compared with a prosperous people on the shores of the Mississippi and on the Gulf? Nothing. Our corn will remain at fifteen cents a bushel in the localities to which the Senator has referred unless we can have this southern market. I know that the Mississippi river is open; there is no military interference with the passage of boats down the river; but I know that the confidence between the two sections upon which trade and commerce must rest has not been restored, and it will not be restored until the States are restored to all their political relations to the Federal Government.

But, sir, I do not intend to discuss that question now. I say that we ought to take time to consider so important a measure as this. It is the first time in the history of Congress, I believe, that it has been proposed to create a great corporation with powers to be exercised exclusively within a State. Let us take until next session for consideration of the subject. It is time now that we should adjourn. The interests of the country, I think, require an adjournment of Congress. Trade is uncertain until we do adjourn. The business men of the country cannot tell in what respect the acts of Congress may change their interests from day to day, and until we do adjourn the trade and business of the country will not be stable and fixed. I think it is for the interest of the country that we should adjourn; and I am sure it is for our own comfort. I am in favor of postponing this and any other general measure that can be postponed until the next session. We have done about enough. We have made up a considerable record here; let that go before the country; let the country judge of it; and let a verdict be passed at the coming elections; and then, no doubt, the judgments of all of us will be aided by that verdict.

Mr. TRUMBULL. Mr. President, I do not yield to the Senator from Indiana in my desire for the restoration of harmony and peace and friendly intercourse between all the sections of this country. I desire it as ardently and as earnestly as he does; but I say to the Senator from Indiana that we will never have peace and harmony while he insists on putting the control of the late rebel States in the hands of traitors and rebels. His constituents and mine, the loyal men who went into the Army and by force of arms put down the hostile traitors, will never consent that the control of that country which they marched through and in which they dispersed the rebel hordes shall be given to the men they dispersed and scattered, so that those men shall take control of those States and persecute, oppress, and degrade loyal men. It is the Senator from Indiana, and those like him, who seek to uphold traitors in office in the South, that keep up this difficulty.

Is the Senator from Indiana in favor of placing the control of the States lately in rebellion in the hands of the rebels? Is the vice president of the rebel confederacy to come in here as a Senator? Is his colleague, Herschel V. Johnson, fresh from the rebel congress, to come here to legislate for the loyal people of this country? Let the Senator from Indiana shake off his party shackles and rise up to the Union sentiment of this country, and say to the people of the South, "You, rebels, that brought on this war and occasioned all this desolation and woe throughout the land, North and South, stand back; let the loyal men of the country rule the country." Let him unite with us, and they will take back seats; we will welcome the southern States lately in the rebellion in the control of loyal men; and I will unite with the Senator from Indiana in welcoming their loyal representatives to seats here and in the other House of Congress by the passage of laws that shall recognize those States at once as in friendly and constitutional relations with the Government.

If the Senator from Indiana wants harmony restored, if he wants friendly intercourse among the inhabitants of the late rebellious States, I tell him he cannot have it until there is a Union sentiment in the South that will protect a Union man in the South. He cannot have it when a man for his personal safety in traveling through the lately rebellious districts has to conceal his love of the Union. He cannot have it when the national flag cannot be borne in safety through the streets of Mobile. He cannot have it when loyal men and women are not permitted to go and scatter flowers upon the graves of the heroes who fell to maintain the Union. The loyal element of this country, the Union men of this nation, have suffered too much and too long to have affiliation and friendship with the traitors that brought upon them that suffering and who still persist in oppressing Union and loyal men.

Sir, I am betrayed into the making of these remarks in reply to the insinuation of the Senator that friendly intercourse and harmony between the different sections of the country are prevented by any action of mine. I came to this Congress determined to do all in my power to bring about that result at the earliest practicable period consistent with the safety of all; and till then he cannot have it.

One word as to the price of corn. Why, sir, it was before this rebellion that corn sold in my State at eight cents a bushel. I have never known corn as cheap as it was some years ago, before the rebellion, when the avenues of trade were all open; and for the Senator to undertake to say that because of the unfriendly relations that have existed between the North and the South, or because we do not recognize that traitors shall rule the South, therefore our prices are depressed, is an entire misapprehension. So far as the markets down the river are concerned, trade and commerce are as open and free as ever; and the price which corn has borne in the last year has not been so low as it was some years previous to the war. I presume the Senator himself is aware of that fact.

But, sir, I am sorry to be drawn off from the consideration of this bill, which I regard as of vital importance to his constituents and mine, by this discussion or any discussion in relation to the national affairs of the country as connected with the late rebellion. This is a great national work which we need in time of peace and harmony in the country. We shall need it more in time of war because it will open a passage for our war vessels in case of difficulty with a foreign nation who might hold the country north of us. Therefore, in a military point of view, it is a work of essential importance for the proper defense and security of the country.

The provision as to the State of New York giving her consent before this bill shall go into operation is one which I do not favor. I am for striking that provision out. The Senate has not yet taken the vote upon it. Under the motion made by the Senator from New York to postpone the bill, we cannot now get a vote upon it until that other question is disposed of. In my judgment that provision should be stricken out, because I go for this work as a national work. I hold that the Federal Government has a right to make this improvement, because it is an improvement necessary and essential and proper to be made for the defense of the country and for the national good of the country. If it is a work that the State of New York has a right to control, then it is a local work, and the Federal Government would have no right to construct a work for the benefit of New York or dependent upon the will of New York. It must be national in order to authorize the Federal Government to undertake it. It might perhaps aid in it, even if it was entirely a State work, incidentally; but to undertake a purely State work I think would be a stretch of the constitutional power of the Government. So much, then, for that proposition. As the bill stands, however, the consent of New York is necessary; and on this question of postponement we propose to postpone a bill to which the consent of New York is necessary before it can go into operation. I should be glad to have the consent of New York. I should be glad to have harmony. I should be glad if they would coöperate willingly in this work. I regret that a local work in the State of New York, in which her people feel a great pride, and justly so, one which has redounded to the credit of that State and to the honor of its projectors and to the benefit of the whole nation; I regret that that work should have such an influence upon the representatives of that great State here as to induce them to oppose this measure. Sir, it would be but adding another to the many honors justly belonging to New York to have her come in and aid to increase and open more perfectly these great thoroughfares which are to bind the Union together.

Mr. HENDRICKS. I do not intend to prolong the discussion upon a question that is not directly relevant to the bill before the Senate; but it is proper that I should very briefly reply to the Senator from Illinois. He states the proposition that the relations between these States cannot be restored while I and others who think as I do are in favor of placing the southern States under the control of rebels, and giving rebels a representation in Congress. Sir, I think that Congress has no control over the selection of the officers of the different States. As an Indianian, I am not willing to give up to the Federal Government, and I think as an Illinois man the Senator would hardly ask that Illinois should give up to the Federal Government the control of the officers of the State, or that the Federal Government should in any way control their selection. It may serve the Senator's purpose upon the hustings, but it will hardly serve his purpose here to say that I, or any who agree with me in opinion, are now advocating the admission to seats in this body or in the House of Representatives of persons who were directly connected with the rebellion. The Senator knows very well that there now stands upon the statute-book of the country, there now stands upon the rules of the Senate, a provision requiring every person who claims a seat in the Senate to take a most solemn oath. I will read that oath that this question may be settled.

Mr. TRUMBULL. Will the Senator allow me to ask him if he is in favor of that oath and that rule?

Mr. HENDRICKS. My views upon that subject will be expressed by my motions and by my votes. I have not asked to repeal that law. I have not the power, nor have those who agree with me in the Senate the power to repeal it. Does the Senator consent to its repeal?

Mr. TRUMBULL. Certainly not; but I apprehend the Senator will not help me to keep it in force.

Mr. HENDRICKS. Mr. President, I will tell the Senator how far I will help him to keep it in force. If any man asks to take a seat here and proposes to take this oath when he cannot truthfully take it, I will not be for his admission. However unconstitutional I may regard the oath, I will not vote to let a man take a seat here who is willing to testify falsely even under an unconstitutional law. This is the oath which is required by law, and by the rules of the Senate, of any one who proposes to take a seat in this body:

"I do solemnly swear that I have never voluntarily borne arms against the United States since I have been a citizen thereof; that I have voluntarily given no aid, countenance, counsel, or encouragement to persons engaged in armed hostility thereto; that I have neither sought nor accepted nor attempted to exercise the functions of any office whatever under any authority or pretended authority in hostility to the United States; that I have not yielded a voluntary support to any pretended government, authority, power, or constitution within the United States, hostile or inimical thereto. And I do further swear that, to the best of my knowledge and ability, I will support and defend the Constitution of the United States against all enemies, foreign and domestic; that I will bear true faith and allegiance to the same; that I take this obligation freely, without any mental reservation or purpose of evasion; and that I will well and faithfully discharge the duties of the office on which I am about to enter; so help me God."

The law which requires this oath is dated as far back as July, 1862. There has been no proposition during these four years for its repeal. It stands as the law of the country. It stands unrepealed, with all the force that an enactment of Congress, such as it is, can have. Then, sir, no man from the southern States can take a seat in either Hall of Congress unless he is prepared to swear, and unless the fact be, that he has had no voluntary connection with the rebellion; that he has given it no aid or counsel; that he has borne true faith and allegiance to the Government all the while; and that hereafter he will bear such faith and allegiance. Such men, the Senator from Illinois says, such men, the policy of his party says, shall not be admitted to represent the southern States. The question is not, shall rebels take seats in Congress—and there is no use in stating the question truly—the question is not, shall rebels take seats in Congress; the question is not, shall any man that has been connected with the rebellion in any way take a seat in Congress; but the question is, shall men selected by competent authority in the southern States, chosen according to the provisions of the Constitution, who have had no connection with the rebellion, who have stood out against it, during all the controversy have borne true faith and allegiance to the Government, loyal men as they are called—shall they be allowed to take seats in Congress; and you say no.

The men in the South whose allegiance to the Government during this struggle has been worth ten times, so far as suffering is concerned, so far as moral courage is concerned, as much as the allegiance of a man in the North, you say shall not be the representatives of the southern States. As was said by some Senator the other day, it has not been much of a trial to be true to the country in the northern States. Public sentiment was all that way; it bore a man along as the tide of the ocean will bear a boat. It was not a matter of will, scarcely, in the northern States. It was no question of moral courage in the northern States. There it required moral courage to go against the Government in the controversy. What, then, have we to boast of in the northern States that we have been true all the while? We have gone with the popular current; we have gone where interest was; we have gone where ambition led; we have gone where gain was to be found. But the man of talent, of hope, of ambition in the South that dared to stand up for his flag and his Government during the five years of the war, with what had he to contend? There was no current carrying him on to high places of pride and ambition; there was no opportunity for wealth and gain in the form of rich contracts to the true man of the South. He had to meet a popular prejudice such as no Senator in this body has any knowledge of. Against the whole pressure of his section of the country he stood for the flag, the Constitution, and the Union. True in the midst of trial; true in the midst of persecution; true when every influence that can be brought to bear upon the human mind was brought to bear against his loyalty, his faith, and his allegiance to his country, and in the midst of it all he came out true; and you say that he shall not be a representative in this Hall! It is his cause that we plead under the law of the land. The law says that no other man shall be admitted to a seat. You cannot misrepresent it here, whatever may be done before the people. The oath is here; we have all taken it; and we know that before any man from Georgia or Tennessee can take a seat on this floor he must swear, as we have sworn, that he has had nothing to do with the rebellion.

The Senator asks me if I am in favor of the admission of the two distinguished gentlemen that he has mentioned from Georgia, Mr. Stephens and Mr. Johnson. I dare say that the Senator from Illinois has a high admiration for the course that Mr. Stephens pursued prior to and up to the very commencement of the war; but finally, yielding to the opinions which he entertained that his allegiance was to his State, when his State seceded he went with it. But the Senator cannot ask me if I am in favor of the admission of Stephens and Johnson. I am not while the law stands. The law says that Stephens and Johnson must take this oath. Can they take it? If they can in truth I am in favor of their admission; but while the law stands I am in favor of no man taking a seat in this Hall who cannot truthfully swear to this oath. Let any man come and propose to take this oath who cannot do it truthfully, and I am against his admission.

Then, sir, the question is, shall we admit the true men of the South? And that is the question which is to be fought before the people this year—the question whether the southern States shall be represented, not by rebels, not by traitors, but by men who in the midst of the great controversy, in the midst of the storm of passion and prejudice that bore down upon them, stood true to the flag, the Constitution, and the Union. I say we are bound to admit them by the resolution of 1861. We then said when the obligation to the Constitution was enforced the war should cease and the Union become restored. The Union being restored, the Constitution of our country says each State shall have two Senators in this body. That Constitution is not changed. It is a constitutional right, when they come prepared to take this oath under the law, to take their seats in this Hall. I am in favor of giving them their seats, restoring those States to all their practical relations to the Federal Government, and then let trade and commerce find their channels again. Let our trade on its way down the Mississippi find a prosperous people there ready to buy whatever we have to sell. I say that that state of things is worth a dozen Niagara canals to the people of southern Indiana and Illinois.

Mr. President, it is not my intention to protract the discussion upon this question; but this has been so frequently misrepresented, or at least misstated, that I felt it to be my duty to correct it, to show just what was the question before the country and what is the question here. It is, who shall be admitted under the existing law?

Now, sir, this session of Congress has continued on until July. If we have got to take up bills like this and discuss and pass them and consider all their provisions, this session must last until some time in August. This certainly is not desirable. It is not necessary for the prosperity of this enterprise, even if Congress eventually shall agree to it. We can pass this bill at the next session, if it is desirable to pass it at all, and the work can commence in the spring of the next year. It could hardly commence this year if we passed this bill now. There is no delay then caused by postponing the bill, and a vote to postpone is not a vote in hostility to the measure. I think it is very proper to postpone it, considering the opposition that is made to the present consideration of the bill by the great State of New York. I think it is due to ourselves, considering the length of the session, as we have now gone into the middle of the summer months, and I think it is due to Congress and to the country that we should adjourn.

Mr. TRUMBULL. We have, in the course pursued by the Senator from Indiana, another illustration of the truth that practice and precept do not always go together. One would have supposed that a Senator so anxious to bring this session to a close, suffering so much from the heats of summer, and the apprehensions of protracting the session into August, would not introduce an extraneous matter upon this bill to take up the time of Congress and prolong its session. But, sir, not satisfied with having introduced the subject, and having made one speech upon it, to which I undertook to reply briefly, he repeats the speech over two or three times, and he says that nothing can be gained by stating the question untruly; that it might do upon the hustings, but it will not do here. Well, sir, I propose to go along with the Senator and see what he has stated and what he is for.

He says he is not for admitting persons here who will not take that oath as long as the law remains; and when I press him to know if he is in favor of the law, he says, "You will find out by my course." He speaks of the law as unconstitutional. Let us see, then, the position in which the Senator from Indiana has placed himself. He is in favor of enforcing that law, and he believes it unconstitutional! He is in favor here in this high assembly of the nation of enforcing a rule that he believes to be unconstitutional! He is sworn to support the Constitution; he believes the rule violates it, is unconstitutional; and under the solemn oath he has taken, and the appeal to his God that he will stand by the Constitution, he says he will enforce the law! He did not say it was unconstitutional, but he intimated as much. He used the word "unconstitutional;" but I suppose it was rather by way of circumlocution. I do not wish to misstate the Senator. I have no doubt he thinks so; but with that caution for which he is peculiar he made the statement in such a way as not to affirm positively that it was unconstitutional, though he said enough to leave the inference upon the mind of every one who heard him that he believed it to be unconstitutional. Now, I should like to know from him if that is not his opinion. I presume I should get the answer I received before, "You will ascertain by my course." He would admit these Senators from the South, and the day they took their seats he would vote to repeal the law that required the oath. Then who would come in here? The moment you get enough members into this body under the oath to repeal the law that required the oath, would you not repeal it? Dare the Senator from Indiana rise in his place and say to this Senate and to his constituents and to the country that he would not vote to repeal the law any day that his vote would carry such a measure? Let him not, then, dodge behind this bulwark of a law or a rule of the Senate to which he is opposed, and which he believes to be unconstitutional, and seek to thrust in here men enough to repeal it in order that traitors may come unobstructed afterward.

But, sir, who is it that is raising this clamor about being kept out of Congress? Is it the loyal men of the South? Who is it that raises this howl about not being represented here? Your Stephens and your Johnsons and your Sharkeys, Orr, of South Carolina, and your men connected with this rebellion; the men who went from the Federal Congress into the rebel congress, and from the rebel congress became Governors of States, and now the boon companions of the Senator from Indiana with whom he has gone to bed, expecting to wake up on the 14th of August at Philadelphia. They are the men that raise the howl. Governor Orr has made his bed with the Senator from Indiana, and will meet him on the morning of the 14th of August at the city of Philadelphia to reconstruct the Union! They are the men that raise this objection; it is not the true, loyal men of the South. You do not hear it from Fowler, of Tennessee, from Stokes, of Tennessee, from Maynard, of Tennessee, from Hamilton, of Texas; you do not hear it from the true Union men of the South who stood out, as the Senator from Indiana so eloquently said, in defense of the Union in the midst of treason. They are not the men who are raising this howl. They want the South controlled by loyal men. They want the States lately in rebellion to be under the control of men true to the Union. Does the Senator from Indiana? If he does, why did he oppose the proposition in this body that men connected with the rebellion should not hold office in the South—a few of them only, the leaders? We brought in a proposition here that certain officers who had sworn to support the Constitution of the United States, and had disregarded that oath and taken up arms against the United States, should not be permitted to hold office in the southern States, and we find the Senator from Indiana opposing it. Are you in favor, then, of those men holding office in the South? I presume you are, just as you are in favor of their coming here, and you have taken shelter to-day behind a law which you would repeal the moment you have the power. I am for keeping this body and keeping this nation and keeping all the States of this Union loyal and true to the Constitution of the Union.

But, says the Senator, some of these persons can take the oath and you do not admit them; why do you not admit them? Because we have no evidence that they come from loyal constituencies. The Senator says he is ready to admit anybody that will take the oath. Would he admit a man as a Senator here who came from a State in flagrant war against the Government? The declaration he has made here to-day would compel him to do so. The only question he asks is, is the representative prepared to take this oath? Then what would have prevented South Carolina, in the midst of the war, from electing any man as her Senator and his being admitted here to a seat?

Mr. HENDRICKS. I supposed that I had expressed myself so clearly upon that question that the clear intellect of the Senator from Illinois could not misunderstand it. I said that I was in favor of admitting any one who came here from competent authority who could truthfully take this oath.

Mr. TRUMBULL. And did not the Senator further say that Congress had no right to determine what was competent authority?

Mr. HENDRICKS. I did not say so, sir.

Mr. TRUMBULL. I understood the Senator to say that Congress had no right to determine upon that question.

Mr. HENDRICKS. No, sir; I said nothing like it. I do not question the competency of the Senate to decide upon the elections of its members.

Mr. TRUMBULL. Does the Senator question the authority of Congress to decide whether a State has a Legislature loyal to the Union and with authority to be represented? That is the question.

Mr. HENDRICKS. That is not the question that the Senator suggested. I said that I was in favor of admitting to this floor any man who could take this oath truly who came authorized by competent authority. The Senate, under the Constitution of the United States, may decide whether he comes from competent authority. That is my answer.

Mr. TRUMBULL. Then do I understand the Senator—and I want to keep him to the point; I am not talking about the Senate's authority to decide upon the elections, qualifications, and returns of its own members—I want to know of that Senator if he denies the authority of the sovereign power of this nation, the Congress of the United States, not the Senate, but the Congress of the United States, to determine whether the body claiming to be competent to elect Senators is the legislative authority of a State or not.

Mr. HENDRICKS. That is not the question which I discussed, and to which the Senator is replying; but I will say this, that the Constitution of the United States having conferred upon the Senate the exclusive power of judging of the elections, returns, and qualifications of its own members, it is not for Congress to decide any one of those questions, but for the Senate exclusively.

Mr. TRUMBULL. That is reasoning around a circle. The Senator repeats over the Constitution, which says the Senate of the United States has authority to determine upon the elections, returns, and qualifications of its members. We all know that. That is not the question I put. I have not been able to get a satisfactory answer from the Senator from Indiana as to whether he denies the power of Congress to determine whether a State is in rebellion against this Union or not. Sir, I hold that the power is in Congress to declare war; that the power is in Congress to provide for raising armies, to put down insurrection and rebellion, and nowhere else but in Congress; and that it is for Congress to determine whether the body of men assembled in Columbia, South Carolina, and undertaking to make war against the United States, is a competent authority to elect Senators or do any other act whatever. I hold that it is competent under a law of Congress, and not by any action of the Senate, to send our armies to disperse any such hostile body, called a Legislature, in South Carolina, Indiana, Illinois, or anywhere else. If a body of men assemble in Springfield, in my State, claiming to be the Legislature of that State, and proceed to organize troops, to set at defiance the authority of the Government of the United States, swear its members to disregard the Constitution of the United States, trample upon the flag of the United States, despise its laws and its officers, repudiate both, I say it is for Congress, not only to prevent such a body sending Senators here, but, if necessary, to shoot them upon the battle-field or hang them upon the gallows for their treason. Does the Senator deny the power of Congress to do all this?

Mr. HENDRICKS. Mr. President, if the Senator claims to be answering any remarks that I had the honor to submit to the Senate, he may ask me any question growing out of them; but he has no right to go into the discussion of another subject and propound questions to me to answer in a few words in the midst of his speech. Now, I understand the question that he asks to be about this: whether, if there be a rebellion or an insurrection in any of the States, Congress has power to authorize the putting down of that insurrection or rebellion. I have no question of that. I never doubted that. There was nothing in my remarks that suggested a doubt of that. I have been talking about the country as it is. The war is over; there is no insurrection anywhere; and it is not true to history or to fact to say that there is a war. There is no rebellion North or South. Certain Legislatures have assembled in the southern States. They have elected men as Senators. They come here and present their credentials. I say it is exclusively for the Senate to decide upon their credentials; and the Constitution having given that power to the Senate, it is not for the House to participate in the decision of that question. As to what shall be done in a state of war, whether we shall put down an insurrection, that is another question. Of the power of the Government to put down an insurrection I have no doubt. It is expressly provided for in the Constitution. But the question that I discussed was the right of a man to take his seat when he came here with all the qualifications prescribed by the Constitution and the law in a time of peace, as we now have it; and the Senator upon that question cannot argue it as if we were in the midst of a state of war. What a State may do in the midst of war is another question. Thank God, sir, we have passed the point of war more than one year; and for one long year this country has anxiously hoped for a complete return of all the States to their practical relations to the Government.

Mr. TRUMBULL. I understood what the Senator from Indiana was arguing. It is no uncommon thing for advocates at the bar to avoid an issue and attempt to get up another one. He commenced this discussion by saying that the southern States were not represented here and insisting they were kept out of representation; and now he wants to go off into a discussion of the right of the Senate to determine upon the elections, qualifications, and returns of its own members. We shall have no difficulty about that point when there is anybody authorized to elect members; he and I will both agree. When you find some constituency competent to elect members the Senate will determine whether the persons they send here possess the requisite qualifications and were duly elected; and we shall have no difficulty about the qualifications, elections, and returns of the persons. But, sir, I deny that that clause of the Constitution has any application to the admission of Senators here from the Canadian Provinces, from the empire of Mexico or the empire of Japan. When Congress has declared the empire of Mexico a State of this Union, and recognized it as one of the States entitled to representation, then it will be for the Senate to pass upon the elections, qualifications, and returns of persons sent here from that Mexican State; but it is not for the Senate to decide whether the empire of Mexico is entitled to representation or not. I do not choose to follow the Senator from Indiana off after any ignis fatuus light that he may set up, to hang out false colors and raise false issues to the country. There is no issue between the Senator and myself as to the authority of the Senate to pass upon the elections, qualifications, and returns of its members, and never has been. It lies behind it, and it is there I wish to bring the Senator from Indiana, and there he is not willing to go.

Mr. HENDRICKS. If the Senator will allow me, upon his last illustration, as that is purely original in the present debate, though I heard it suggested some time ago in the course of another debate, I do not question that it is for the Congress of the United States to admit States, and until States have their relations to the Federal Government, either by the original formation of the Government or by an act of Congress, no distant community would have any right of representation in this body; but when the relation of a State has been fixed by the original formation of the Government which admitted into the Union the thirteen States, or by the acts of Congress admitting all the States that have come in since, when the relation of the State is fixed and it is in the Union, is it not for the Senate exclusively to decide upon the elections and qualifications of its members? Can the House of Representatives participate in the decision of the question whether a Legislature is properly constituted to elect a Senator, or whether that Legislature being so constituted proceeds with sufficient regularity to elect a Senator? Is not that question exclusively with the Senate?

Mr. TRUMBULL. The Senator says that when the relation of a State has been fixed as a State in the Union, then the question is exclusively for the Senate to determine.

Mr. NYE. If the Senator from Illinois will allow me to interrupt him for a moment, I insist upon it that it is hardly fair for him to push the Senator from Indiana any further at this time before he has got settled in his new political associations. [Laughter.]

Mr. TRUMBULL. The Senator from Indiana assumes now—and I am willing to take up his position where he left it—that a State having its relations established with the Union, it is then for the Senate to determine for itself ever afterward, as I understand him, whether it is entitled to representation here. A moment ago when I pressed him on that point and wanted to know if when flagrant war existed the Legislature of South Carolina had a right to send members here, what was his answer? "I am not talking about war; I am talking about a time of peace." Now, the State of South Carolina once had relations established with this Union; she had once authority to be represented here. Does the Senator from Indiana, then, mean to assert that when flagrant war existed, when the Legislature of South Carolina passed an ordinance of secession declaring her relations with this Union dissolved, when she required an oath from every officer of that State in hostility to this Union and in favor of a government set up in hostility to it; I should like to know if the Senator from Indiana means to say that at that time she was entitled to representation here, when the authority of the Government was not recognized upon a single foot of her soil? Does he mean to say that she was entitled to representation here then? If not, there was a time she was not entitled to be represented. If there was such a time, when, under the authority of Congress, the President of the United States declared the people of that State to be in insurrection and rebellion against the Government, if at that time a people at war with this Government were not entitled to representation, will he tell me how they became entitled to it? Where is the authority to judge whether they have become entitled to representation except the same authority which declared them in rebellion against the Union? Is there any other? Does the Senator in his admiration or in his zeal for the new affiliations which he has formed, mean to contend that the President of the United States has any authority to determine what is the Legislature of a State? Has the President of the United States any authority to interfere with the Legislature of a State? When the Senator proclaimed peace throughout this land, when he said that the Union was restored and all was quiet, had he looked into the morning papers he would have seen an order issued by authority of the Lieutenant General demanding the armies all through the South to interfere in civil suits for the protection of the citizen. Does that look like peace there? Has the Army any authority to interfere with the citizen in time of peace? The morning papers contain an order issued from the Adjutant General's office, and of course by authority of the President, establishing military authority all over the rebellious States. They are at peace, are they? Is not the habeas corpus suspended throughout these rebellious States? Is it not suspended in Texas to-day? I have seen no evidence of its restoration.

Now, sir, it is for Congress to determine, not the President of the United States. He has no authority to organize Legislatures. He has no authority to say who shall be a probate judge in Mobile in time of peace. He has no authority to say who shall hold an office in Norfolk in time of peace; and yet all these things have been done. It is idle for the Senator from Indiana to shut his eyes to what is apparent to the whole country, what everybody sees. Sir, the southern States lately in rebellion are not restored in their constitutional relations. They have not organized State governments with authority to representation in either House of Congress. The power which declared them in insurrection and rebellion is the only power to declare them out of that insurrection and rebellion. When that declaration shall be made—and I trust the facts and the circumstances of the country may admit of its being made at an early day—then, sir, it will be for each House to determine for itself whether the representatives possess the requisite qualifications and have been duly elected. That is the question. It is a mistaken notion to say that the constitutional relations of these States have been restored. Such is not the fact. They talk about the Executive Government having restored them. The Executive Government has no power to restore them; and if it had the power, it has not done it. It interferes every day. The ink is scarcely dry upon an order establishing military authority through every one of them. It has not been done even by the Executive. He has not pretended to do it. He could not do it if he tried. Now, sir, we are making all haste to restore these constitutional relations, and when that is done we shall be glad to receive representatives who are qualified and properly elected into both Houses of Congress.

The PRESIDING OFFICER, (Mr. POMEROY in the chair.) The question is on the motion of the Senator from New York [Mr. MORGAN] to postpone the further consideration of the bill until the second Tuesday in December next, upon which motion the yeas and nays have been ordered.

Mr. RIDDLE. I wish to state that I have paired off on this bill with the Senator from Illinois, who is absent, [Mr. YATES.] If I were at liberty to do so I should vote for the postponement and against the bill.

The question being taken by yeas and nays, resulted—yeas 24, nays 18; as follows:

YEAS—Messrs. Anthony, Brown, Buckalew, Clark, Cowan, Davis, Fessenden, Foster, Grimes, Guthrie, Harris, Henderson, Hendricks, Johnson, Lane of Indiana, Morgan, NeSmith, Norton, Saulsbury, Sherman, Van Winkle, Willey, Williams, and Wilson—24.

NAYS—Messrs. Chandler, Cragin, Doolittle, Edmunds, Howard, Howe, Poland, Pomeroy, Ramsey, Sprague, Sumner, Trumbull, and Wade—18.

ABSENT—Messrs. Conness, Creswell, Dixon, Kirkwood, Lane of Kansas, McDougall, Morrill, Nye, Riddle, Stewart, Wright, and Yates—12.

So the motion was agreed to.

RELIEF OF PORTLAND SUFFERERS.

Mr. FESSENDEN. I ask the permission of the Senate to allow me to offer a joint resolution, which it is necessary to pass immediately for the purpose of sending it to the House of Representatives, with reference to the sufferers by the late fire in the city of Portland. I think it will occasion no debate. If it does I will withdraw it. I send it to the desk to be read.

By unanimous consent leave was granted to introduce a joint resolution (S. No. 131) for the temporary relief of the sufferers by the late fire in Portland, in the State of Maine; and it was read twice, and considered as in Committee of the Whole.

It proposes to authorize the Commissioner of Internal Revenue to suspend the collection of such taxes as may have been assessed or as may have accrued prior to July 5, 1866, in the first collection district in the State of Maine against any person residing, doing business, or owning property in that portion of the city of Portland recently destroyed by fire; but this suspension is not to continue after the close of the next session of Congress.

Mr. FESSENDEN. I will say one word in explanation of the resolution. It is a mere authority to suspend the collection of taxes; and the great reason for it is that by the law if they are not paid in a certain time an addition of ten per cent. is made; and it is utterly impossible for a great many of these persons to pay at present.

Mr. JOHNSON. Is there any time limited for the suspension?

Mr. FESSENDEN. It is limited so that it shall not be in force beyond the next session of Congress, so that Congress may then legislate further on the subject if necessary.

The joint resolution was reported to the Senate without amendment.

Mr. SHERMAN. An objection occurs to me from the reading of the resolution that it might extend to persons who did not suffer at all by the fire. It applies to all persons living in the burnt district, but many persons may have lived in that district who have not actually suffered, by reason of insurance.

Mr. FESSENDEN. It says distinctly "residing, or doing business, or owning property" in the burnt district. It was drawn by the Commissioner himself, and merely confers upon him the authority of suspending the collection of the tax.

Mr. SHERMAN. I have no objection to the objection.

Mr. FESSENDEN. The Commissioner stated to me that he should send to the collector to inform him of the cases where it would be advisable and necessary to make the suspension. The resolution does not compel him to suspend the collection. Let it be read again, and Senators will see that it is guarded. The Secretary read the resolution.

Mr. JOHNSON. Is the day named the day of the fire?

Mr. FESSENDEN. Yes, sir. I think it should read "prior to the 4th;" but "prior to the 5th" will do as well.

Mr. JOHNSON. I ask the honorable member if some taxes have not accrued since the 5th.

Mr. FESSENDEN. The fire was extinguished on the 5th; it was only two days.

Mr. JOHNSON. Have any taxes accrued since?

Mr. FESSENDEN. I do not know.

Mr. JOHNSON. If they have, this ought to extend to them.

Mr. FESSENDEN. The language of the resolution is, "such taxes as may have been assessed or as may have accrued." The resolution is carefully drawn.

Mr. SHERMAN. I do not wish to oppose the resolution; but I rise to suggest to the Senator from Maine that he will see himself that there might be very many cases where persons owning property in the burnt district have not been injured by the fire, even, perhaps, where they resided in the burnt district, and to whom this relief ought not to be granted. I suggest that there ought to be a discretion—

Mr. FESSENDEN. It is discretionary now.

Mr. SHERMAN. I know; but I would say, "in such cases where the evidence satisfies him that the parties have lost and are sufferers by the fire."

Mr. FESSENDEN. I am perfectly willing that the Senator shall put on any proviso that he pleases.

Mr. SHERMAN. This proceeding is rather unusual.

Mr. FESSENDEN. The resolution was drawn by the Commissioner; there are only two or three words inserted by me, such as "owning property." I wish to have it guarded properly.

Mr. SHERMAN. I do not wish to set a bad example.

Mr. FESSENDEN. That is right.

Mr. SHERMAN. I move to amend the resolution by inserting after the word "fire," in the sixteenth line, the words, "and who in the opinion of said Commissioner has suffered material loss by such fire."

The amendment was agreed to.

The joint resolution was ordered to be engrossed for a third reading, was read the third time, and passed.

INTERNAL TAXATION.

Mr. VAN WINKLE submitted the following resolution; which was referred to the Committee on Printing:

Resolved. That there be printed for the use of the Senate, five thousand copies of the internal tax laws now in force, so that the several provisions in relation to the same subject shall be inserted in connection, together with a suitable index to the same, the whole to be compiled and prepared for printing under the direction of the Commissioner of Internal Revenue.

MESSAGE FROM THE HOUSE.

A message from the House of Representatives, by Mr. McPHERSON, its Clerk, announced that the House had passed a bill (H. R. No. 779) to incorporate the National Soldiers' and Sailors' Orphan Home, in which it requested the concurrence of the Senate.

The bill was read twice by its title and referred to the Committee on the District of Columbia.

NORTHERN PACIFIC RAILROAD.

Mr. WILLIAMS. I move that the Senate proceed to the consideration of the bill (S. No. 387) to secure the speedy construction of the Northern Pacific railroad and telegraph line, and to secure to the Government the use of the same for postal, military, and other purposes.

Mr. SHERMAN. I call for the yeas and nays on the motion to take up this bill. It is a bill guarantying the payment of interest on the stock of the Northern Pacific Railroad Company. It is a bill involving millions upon millions of dollars. It is evident that we ought not to take up the few hours left of this session in discussing and considering so grave a measure. The committee, as a matter of course, were divided upon it. The bill proposes to guaranty for twenty years the interest on about one hundred millions of the Northern Pacific railroad stock. It is a bill of magnitude, and therefore it is hardly worth while to begin to discuss it at this period of the session.

Mr. ANTHONY. If the Senator from Ohio will yield me the floor, I will make a motion that will perhaps meet his views; and that is that the Senate proceed to the consideration of executive business.

Mr. SHERMAN. I think we had better have the sense of the Senate tested on taking up this bill; otherwise the motion will be made again to-morrow. I wish to test the matter now. I ask for the yeas and nays.

The yeas and nays were ordered.

Mr. HOWARD. I hope this bill will be taken up. The Committee on the Pacific Railroad had the matter under consideration, and after the most thorough consideration they were able to give it, they felt it their duty to recommend its passage to the Senate. It has undergone a very thorough and careful investigation on their part. There is no doubt about the importance of the measure, as the Senator from Ohio has said; but I do not see why a bill so important as this confessedly is should be given the go-by in this way. I will not now go into the merits of the measure, because it would be out of order. I hope the Senate will at least pay respect enough to this bill, important as it is, to take it up for consideration. The Senator from Ohio will find before he gets through the discussion of it, if he shall participate in the discussion, that it is as worthy of the consideration of this body as any bill we are likely to consider between this and the adjournment of the Senate. I hope the bill will be taken up.

Mr. SHERMAN. I have but a word to say in reply. This bill will undoubtedly excite a good deal of discussion. That it merits discussion is shown by the fact that it involves so large a sum of money, and that it proposes to aid in the construction of a road to rival one which the Government is actually engaged in building. It is a great and important project, which ought not to be pressed at this period of the session, and I am rather surprised that it is called up. If it was merely called up to enable the Senator to express his views upon it, I should have no objection; but the idea of passing the bill or engaging in its discussion with a view to its passage at this period of the session I think ought not to be entertained.

The bill is now upon our tables; it will come up as unfinished business at the next session, and it can then be considered. The only effect of taking up the bill now will be to consume a considerable portion of time which might well be bestowed upon other business not likely to excite much opposition. It is simply a waste of time to take up the bill at this period of the session, in my judgment.

The question being taken by yeas and nays, resulted—yeas 20, nays 19; as follows:

YEAS—Messrs. Chandler, Clark, Conness, Cragin, Doolittle, Edmunds, Hendricks, Howard, Howe, Nesmith, Norton, Nye, Poland, Pomeroy, Ramsey, Sprague, Sumner, Wade, Williams, and Wilson—20.

NAYS—Messrs. Anthony, Brown, Buckalew, Cowan, Davis, Fessenden, Grimes, Guthrie, Harris, Henderson, Johnson, Kirkwood, Morgan, Riddle, Saulsbury, Sherman, Trumbull, Van Winkle, and Willey—19.

ABSENT—Messrs. Creswell, Dixon, Foster, Lane of Indiana, Lane of Kansas, McDougall, Morrill, Stewart, Wright, and Yates—10.

So the motion was agreed to.

Mr. ANTHONY. If the Senator from Oregon [Mr. WILLIAMS] does not wish to address the Senate this evening, I move that we proceed to the consideration of executive business.

Several SENATORS. Oh, no. Why go into executive session now?

Mr. ANTHONY. There are a great many executive messages that ought to be referred, and it is necessary for the expedition of business that it should be done from day to day unless we are to be detained here after the adjournment of Congress.

The motion was agreed to—ayes thirteen, noes not counted.

After some time spent in executive session the doors were reopened, and the Senate adjourned.

HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES.

FRIDAY, July 13, 1866.

The House met at twelve o'clock m. Prayer by the Chaplain, Rev. C. B. BOYNTON.

On motion of Mr. KUYKENDALL, and by unanimous consent, the reading of the Journal of yesterday was dispensed with.

LEAVE OF ABSENCE.

On motion of Mr. LOAN indefinite leave of absence was granted to his colleague, Mr. KELSO, after to-day.

A. T. SPENCER AND GURDON S. HUBBARD.

Mr. KUYKENDALL, by unanimous consent, from the Committee on the Post Office and Post Roads, reported back Senate bill No. 114, for the relief of A. T. Spencer and Gurdon S. Hubbard, with the recommendation that it do pass.

Mr. BOUTWELL. I should like to know the reason why this bill should be passed.

The bill authorizes and instructs the Postmaster General to audit and adjust the account of A. T. Spencer and Gurdon S. Hubbard, for carrying the United States mail from Chicago, Illinois, to Mackinac, Sault Ste. Marie, Marquette, Copper Harbor, Eagle Harbor, Eagle River, and Ontonagon, Michigan; La Pointe and Superior, Wisconsin, during the years from 1854 to 1859 inclusive, and allow therefor such amount as to him shall appear just and equitable, not exceeding the amount allowed for the same service to the party who afterward performed the same under contract; and the sum by him so found due shall be paid out of the Treasury of the United States out of any of the money therein not otherwise appropriated.

Mr. KUYKENDALL. It will be seen that the labor for which compensation is provided was performed from the year 1854 to 1859. The whole matter has been carefully investigated, and has not only been approved by the Postmaster General, but has been reported favorably six times by committees of Congress. If the bill passes now it will be the third time that the bill has passed this House.

Mr. BOUTWELL. What is the amount proposed to be paid?

Mr. KUYKENDALL. The Postmaster General is not to allow more than was authorized to be paid under the contract. It passed the committees of both Houses unanimously.

The bill was ordered to a third reading; and it was accordingly read the third time and passed.

Mr. KUYKENDALL moved to reconsider the vote by which the bill was passed; and also moved that the motion to reconsider be laid upon the table.

The latter motion was agreed to.

PENSION BILLS.

On motion of the SPEAKER, and by unanimous consent, the House took from the Speaker's table and concurred in the amendments of the Senate, which were merely verbal in their nature, to bills of the following titles:

An act (H. R. No. 702) granting a pension to Mrs. Charlotte E. Reed;

An act (H. R. No. 739) for the relief of Samantha Rader;

An act (H. R. No. 741) granting a pension to Jonathan W. Beach; and

An act (H. R. No. 742) for the relief of the minor children of Salvador Accardi, deceased.

ST. ALBANS BANK.

Mr. WOODBRIDGE, by unanimous consent, introduced a bill for the relief of the St. Albans Bank, of St. Albans, Vermont; which was read a first and second time and referred to the Committee on Banking and Currency.

DAVID WYMAN.

Mr. ANDERSON, by unanimous consent, introduced a bill for the relief of David Wyman; which was read a first and second time and referred to the Committee on the Post Office and Post Roads.

SOLDIERS' AND SAILORS' ORPHANS HOME.

Mr. MERCUR, from the Committee for the District of Columbia, reported a bill to incorporate the National Soldiers' and Sailors' Orphans Home; which was read a first and second time, ordered to be engrossed, and read a third time, and being engrossed, it was accordingly read the third time and passed.

Mr. MERCUR moved to reconsider the vote by which the bill was passed; and also moved that the motion to reconsider be laid upon the table.

The latter motion was agreed to.

ENROLLED BILLS SIGNED.

Mr. TROWBRIDGE, from the Committee on Enrolled Bills, reported that the committee had examined and found truly enrolled bills of the following titles; when the Speaker signed the same:

An act (H. R. No. 456) to extend the benefits of section four of an act making appropriations for the support of the Army for the year ending June 30, 1866, approved March 3, 1865;

An act (H. R. No. 726) to extend to certain persons the privilege of admission, in certain cases, to the United States Government asylums for the insane;

An act (H. R. No. 611) to provide for making the town of Whitehall, New York, a port of delivery; and

An act (H. R. No. 513) to reduce internal taxation and to amend an act entitled "An act to provide internal revenue to support the Government, to pay interest on the public debt, and for other purposes," approved June 30, 1864, and acts amendatory thereof.

ORDER OF BUSINESS.

Mr. STEVENS. I hope the House will agree to take up the miscellaneous appropriation bill for action.

The SPEAKER. The House is under the operation of the previous question in the contested-election case in the twenty-first district of Pennsylvania, and the gentleman from Pennsylvania asks unanimous consent to go into Committee of the Whole and consider the special order, the miscellaneous appropriation bill.

Mr. SPALDING. I object.

Mr. WASHBURN, of Illinois. I hope the gentleman will withdraw his objection, and let the miscellaneous appropriation bill be taken up.

Mr. SPALDING. I have been waiting three days to get up a privileged question.

Mr. WASHBURN, of Illinois. I know the gentleman will hear me. His matter is one of privilege and can be taken up at any time, and it is certainly very important for us, if we want to get home at all, to act on the miscellaneous appropriation bill in order to get it to the Senate. We ought to get through it to-day. I do not think it will take a great while.

Mr. SPALDING. I withdraw the objection.

The SPEAKER. Does the gentleman from Wisconsin [Mr. PAINE] make objection?

Mr. PAINE. I will not insist upon it if the gentleman from Ohio [Mr. SPALDING] withdraws his objection.

MISCELLANEOUS APPROPRIATION BILL.

Mr. STEVENS. I move that the rules be suspended and that the House resolve itself into the Committee of the Whole on the state of the Union on the special order.

The motion was agreed to.

So the rules were suspended; and the House accordingly resolved itself into the Committee of the Whole on the state of the Union, (Mr. RAYMOND in the chair,) and proceeded to the consideration of the special order, being bill of the House No. 737, making appropriations for sundry civil expenses of the Government for the year ending June 30, 1867, and for other purposes.

On motion of Mr. STEVENS, the first reading of the bill was dispensed with, and it was read by sections for amendment.

The Clerk proceeded with the reading of the bill by sections. The following paragraph having been read:

To establish national cemeteries, and to purchase sites for the same, at such points as the President of the United States may deem proper, and for the care of the same, $50,000.

Mr. WASHBURN, of Illinois, said: I wish to make a suggestion in regard to this proposition. A bill is now before the Committee on Military Affairs, and I understand it is ready to be reported—a very proper one it is, too, I should say, because I drew it myself, [laughter]—providing for the establishment of national cemeteries, fencing them, and the erection of monuments in them in the manner prescribed by the bill. If that bill passes—and I hope and believe it will—it will be in contravention of what is proposed here, and will require a much larger appropriation than is made here. Now, my suggestion to the chairman of the committee is, that we should strike out this provision with a view of letting the whole subject go to the Committee on Military Affairs. That bill, which I trust will meet with no opposition—and certainly it will not meet with the opposition of any man who believes that the Government should honor the ashes of the dead who have fallen in the defense of the country—proposes that all those cemeteries where the remains of the soldiers are buried shall be fenced with iron, and provides for the manner in which monuments shall be erected. It also provides for porters' lodges and for the proper care of the grounds. I presume there will be no objection whatever. It will require a larger sum than is provided here, and as that would produce a sort of conflict, I hope the chairman of the committee will consent to strike out this appropriation.

Mr. BINGHAM. Allow me to make an inquiry. I wish to know whether the bill to which the gentleman refers, which is now before the Committee on Military Affairs, if it does not become a law in the form in which it was presented by the gentleman will not place this matter at the discretion of the Government as to the sites of these cemeteries.

Mr. WASHBURN, of Illinois. The sites are already fixed; they are the places where the soldiers are buried.

Mr. BINGHAM. Then it leaves the matter at the discretion of the Secretary of War.

Mr. STEVENS. I move to strike out the clause.

Mr. BINGHAM. I hope that will not be done. This provision can do no harm. I think myself that the Committee on Appropriations have done well in reporting this appropriation, because the gentleman from Illinois must see that if the House fails to pass the bill which he introduced this appropriation will be in aid of the general object.

Mr. WASHBURN, of Illinois. I merely made the suggestion. If the bill to which I have referred can be carried, this clause should be stricken out. If not, it ought to be retained.

Mr. STEVENS. In that view of the case I withdraw my amendment.

Mr. LAFLIN. I move to strike out the following clause:

For the purpose of printing and publishing the first volumes of the Medical and Surgical History of the Rebellion, under the direction of the Surgeon General, $60,000.

And to insert in lieu thereof the following:

For the preparation for publication of the Medical and Surgical History of the Rebellion, $20,000.

According to the terms of the bill, as reported by the Committee on Appropriations, the Medical and Surgical History of the Rebellion is not only to be prepared, but to be printed and published under the direction of the Surgeon General. The House will bear in mind that we already have a law which compels the publication of all such works at the Government Printing Office; and even if the House had already determined that it would assume the expenditure for the publication of this work, which it is universally conceded will amount to half a million dollars, I certainly cannot think that the committee would place the control of the publication of the work in the hands of the Surgeon General alone.

The amendment which I have offered allows the Surgeon General to continue the preparation for publication of the work which he is doing now, but it leaves it in the power of Congress to say who shall print and publish the work when completed. I think the chairman of the Committee on Appropriations will see the propriety of continuing the control of this question in the hands of Congress, and that the work shall be published, in accordance with the laws of Congress, at the Government Printing Office.

Mr. FARNSWORTH. I would say to the gentleman from New York that it requires no appropriation by Congress for the preparation of this report.

Mr. LAFLIN. I will say further, in reference to this matter, that the attention of the Committees on Printing of the House and of the Senate were called by the Surgeon General to this subject, and I will state that at the invitation of the Surgeon General both committees have had interviews with him and have examined these reports as far as they are prepared, and each committee has come to the conclusion to recommend the adoption of the amendment which has been read; and it is to their utter surprise and astonishment that we find here, sprung upon the House in an appropriation bill, an appropriation of $60,000 to publish the first volume. And to publish it how? Just as the Surgeon General chooses to publish it. He may give the contract to whatever party he pleases, to any friend of his in the United States, and upon whatever terms he pleases. Here is a provision involving an expenditure of at least from three hundred to five hundred thousand dollars, according to the calculations of the Surgeon General. That is the lowest calculation made, and it only provides for an edition of five thousand copies. Are we prepared now, without knowing how many copies are to be published and on what terms, to leave it at the discretion of an officer of the Government, independent of the laws of Congress as they now exist, to contract upon his own terms and with his own friends for the publication of a work involving an expenditure of at least half a million dollars?

It is not yet determined that Congress will publish it. But I will state to this House a still further reason why the Committee on Printing did not report in favor of publishing this work, in addition to the large amount of money that is required for the purpose. That reason is, that it has been intimated to us that if the Government will furnish this information, the material for the work, there are private establishments in the United States who would publish this work for the benefit of the world free of cost to the Government. It is really a question in the minds of some whether this information shall be given to the public at the private expense of the individuals that are most to be benefited by it, or whether it shall be given to the public at the expense of the Government for the benefit of certain favorite individuals connected with the office that will have charge of the publication. I also raise the point of order that there is no propriety in this clause at all.

Mr. STEVENS. If the Committee of the Whole determines to strike out this paragraph, I hope they will not insert what is proposed, for that would simply be giving a fee to officers whose duty it is to do this work without any fee. There is nothing proposed in this bill to pay the Surgeon General and his officials for their action in regard to this work. The whole that this proposition is for is the publication of this work. It is to be published, to be sure, under the direction of the Surgeon General. I do not mean to be understood by that that it is not to be published at the Government Printing Office; but the Surgeon General is to supervise the printing. If any gentleman chooses to move an amendment to that effect, I shall have no objection to it.

Mr. WILSON, of Iowa. I would suggest that the paragraph, as reported by the committee, be amended by inserting after the word "publishing" the words "at the Government Printing Office."

Mr. STEVENS. If the gentleman will move that amendment I will have no objection.

Mr. WILSON, of Iowa. I move the amendment I have indicated.

The amendment of Mr. WILSON, of Iowa, was agreed to.

The question recurred upon the amendment of Mr. LAFLIN.

Mr. STEVENS. I do not know how anybody but professional men can supervise and superintend the publication of a mere scientific work like this; one abounding in plates and in scientific terms and researches. There may be very adroit men in the Government Printing Office; among them I know is the Superintendent of Public Printing. But no man is universally learned. And although a celebrated orator, I remember, did assert that all branches of science were bound together by a common bond, he did not mean that every man knew them all, but only that they were themselves connected. Now, I think any man who has had an opportunity of examining the specimen of this work must agree that so valuable a publication in the medical and surgical department has never been given to the world. The opportunities afforded by our great war, the revolution made in the arms of defense and of attack, and the consequent increase and variety of wounds that were inflicted, the different applications made by our learned men going on from learning to learning until I think we have as good a surgical staff as the world ever saw; all this has been such that I do not think that even Larrey himself, with all his knowledge, could do it, because he had not the opportunity. I would say, from what little knowledge I could obtain from the examination of the work, that there is more genuine information upon that subject contained in this work than in any preceding publication upon the same subject. And I think the publication of it will be a public benefaction, and also be a high honor to the nation which produces the work.

Now, I have no idea of asking individuals to speculate upon a work of this kind. I have no idea of allowing enterprising private individuals to publish this work as they please, and to peddle it out as they please. So far as I am concerned I should feel mortified if, after a work has been prepared as this has been, it should be thrown into some bookseller's shop to be published as he pleases, and when he pleases. Sir, I had hoped that this appropriation would meet the unanimous approbation of the House. I am sure that if gentlemen had examined the matter they would hardly have the heart to reject this proposition. While I am willing that this publication should be printed at the Government Printing Office, I think that the work should be done under the direction of the Surgeon General and his able assistants. The amount proposed to be appropriated is very small compared with the sums which other nations have appropriated for scientific publications.

Mr. LAFLIN. Mr. Chairman, I have listened to the remarks of the distinguished chairman of the Committee on Appropriations with a great deal of pleasure; for so far as he pays a compliment to the character of this work, he speaks my own views. No man can hold in higher estimation the utility of this work to the public and to the cause of science than I do. This is the unanimous opinion of all the members of the Joint Committee on Printing, both on the part of the Senate and the House. We have examined this work; and as I said before, it is to our utter surprise that, after we have been invited to an examination of this work, and when we have in our possession a letter from the Surgeon General consenting to an appropriation of a certain sum of money simply for continuing the preparation of this work for publication, we find introduced here an appropriation of $60,000, which, though it may not be regarded in itself as an extravagant expenditure, may be the entering wedge to a system which may result in a vast outlay of money.

Under the terms of this appropriation the Surgeon General will have authority to contract with any person whom he may select for the publication of this entire work; and when the contract is made the Government will be bound thereby. I wish the House to understand distinctly that it is not the intention of my amendment to prevent the future publication of this work; but the object is to postpone the publication until the work shall be more thoroughly completed, with the view to disseminating this very valuable scientific information at a less expense than would be incurred by proceeding with the publication at once. I would like to inquire of the chairman of the Committee on Appropriations when it was that the committee first received from the Surgeon General a suggestion for the incorporation of this provision in the bill.

Mr. STEVENS. I do not remember the exact time. The recommendation for this appropriation has been before the committee for some months—since early in the session, I think.

Mr. LAFLIN. I understood so. I have been informed that the Surgeon General addressed a letter to the chairman of the committee as early as the middle of last January. Yet it is only three or four weeks since, by special invitation, the members on the part of the Senate and the House of the Joint Committee on Printing examined this work, and when we saw its condition we were satisfied that considerable additional progress ought to be made before commencing the publication of the work. A suggestion was made by the Surgeon General that we should introduce into our respective Houses a resolution calling for an appropriation of a certain sum of money and authorizing him to continue the preparation of the work for publication, leaving for the future determination of Congress how it should be published, whether at the Government Printing Office or by some private publication house. He told me himself at the time that, in his judgment, it would not cost over about ten thousand dollars to continue the preparation of this work; but when he came to draw a resolution he asked for a larger sum; and the sum has been fixed at $20,000. If members are ready, in the face of these facts, and simply because the proposition is contained in an appropriation bill, to put the control of this work in the hands of the Surgeon General, and allow him to expend half a million dollars among such people as he may select, they will of course do so. But if, on the contrary, they wish that this work shall be done with proper guards, they will adopt the amendment which I have proposed.

Mr. BINGHAM. I desire to ask the gentleman from New York, [Mr. LAFLIN,] what existing law there is to authorize an appropriation of $20,000 for preparing a "medical and surgical history of the rebellion."

Mr. LAFLIN. The same law, I suppose, which authorizes the appropriation proposed in the bill.

Mr. BINGHAM. No, sir; they are very different things. The one is an appropriation for the publication of a work prepared by an officer in a bureau of the Government in the discharge of the duties of his office. The substitute which the gentleman proposes is that $20,000 be appropriated to pay for the preparation of a work. I want to know what law there is authorizing such an appropriation, and who it is that is to receive this money.

Mr. LAFLIN. Mr. Chairman, this work has been prepared under the direction of the Surgeon General, with the assistance of certain volunteers who have been detailed in his department for that purpose. He has heretofore paid them for these services out of what he calls "slush money"—money made up by the sale of the debris around the camps.

There was a large amount of money from this source in his possession prior to the 1st of July, amounting, I think, to one or two hundred thousand dollars. That was the amount, if my recollection serves me.

Mr. STEVENS. Are these persons in Government employ, or persons hired outside?

Mr. LAFLIN. I expect they are in the employ of the Government.

Mr. STEVENS. Then why are they paid beyond their legal salary?

Mr. LAFLIN. I asked the question of the Surgeon General why it was necessary to get this money, and he said if they were not continued there they must be discharged, because there was no other occasion for their services. I am not able to tell anything in reference to the interior management of the Surgeon General's office. I am telling to the House just exactly what he told us. I believe the House now thoroughly understands this matter, and if this be voted I can only say we have done our duty.

Mr. CLARKE, of Ohio. The gentleman from New York proposes to reduce the appropriation from $30,000 to $20,000. How does he expect with an appropriation of $20,000 any printing can be done this year. In my opinion, $60,000 is not an extravagant sum if it is intended to soon begin the process of printing. It will run through a number of years, and the item of printing is a very large one.

This work is not only of great importance to the scientific world, but to every man, woman, and child in the country. It is of general importance that the work should be published. I am in favor of the appropriation, and I am in favor of such appropriation as will permit the printing to go on as fast as possible. In my judgment, $60,000 is not more than enough. I do not say it should be commenced now, but if it be $60,000 is not too large.

Mr. KASSON. Mr. Chairman, I have examined the letter of the Surgeon General to the committee, and I find in that letter if the action of the House is early enough in granting the appropriation, two volumes will be put to press this year. So, therefore, the intention of this appropriation is to proceed with the publication of the most important parts of it at once, giving the benefits of them to mankind. I ask the House whether, if they intend to publish at any time these most valuable medical statistics and improved appliances for the relief of humanity at large in the world, as well as in the United States, it is not expedient to proceed with the work at once. It is not a work merely to gratify curiosity or to indulge extravagant designs of the medical department. It is to be for the relief of the misfortunes of mankind, especially that portion of those misfortunes which result from the perils of war.

It is the testimony, as we have seen before the committee, of the first medical men in Europe as well as in this country that no existing work will have equal value in the advancement of medical science. When we see nearly all of Europe being involved in war, when we remember this work is to teach surgeons of the world some new and remarkable operations in saving human life and the relief of human miseries, is it not a proper question for us, if we are to publish the work at all, why we should not publish it at once that the world may have the benefit of it? For this reason I agree with the gentleman from Ohio, a member of the Committee on Printing, who says if the work is to be published this appropriation is not too large. I hope the appropriation will be allowed to stand as it is.

Mr. LAFLIN. I renew my point of order. I make the point that the appropriation is not authorized by law.

The CHAIRMAN. The point of order comes too late, as the paragraph has been discussed.

The amendment of Mr. WILSON, of Iowa, was agreed to.

The amendment of Mr. LAFLIN was rejected.

Mr. PRICE. I move to strike out the paragraph, and I will state my reason. There is not more than one man in a hundred, if there be even that, to whom this work will be of any kind of use after being published. Now, this appropriation of $60,000 is but for the commencement of a work which it is admitted will cost $500,000 to complete. We are not here to publish philosophical or scientific works, and I protest against the expenditure of this money for a work of this kind which is of no use except to the profession. If professional men want it let them pay for it.

Mr. STEVENS. I rise to oppose the proposition by saying nothing, for it is the most extraordinary speech I ever heard of enlightened men.

Mr. PRICE. I presume that is the only thing the gentleman could say, for there is no answer to it. This is an expenditure of the people's money for a publication that probably not one in a hundred of this nation will ever see.

Mr. CONKLING. Mr. Chairman, the question how far it is ever well to appropriate money for the purpose of publishing philosophical books, or others, is one upon which a great deal can be said on both sides. But the proposition that this particular work is especially obnoxious to objection seems to me fallacious. As I understand, this proposition is not to publish a work popular in its character—a work designed for the million, and useful, in that sense, as the Agricultural Report, for example, may be, but it is to publish for the benefit of the medical profession, and thus for the benefit of humanity at large, a work which, I am assured by those competent to judge, will be not only without its fellow in medical literature, not only a pioneer, but useful beyond any cost which can possibly be involved, unless profligacy and not economy is observed in its production.

I understand, also, that in order to make the work useful and successful, it should be executed not in the ordinary way, not as you give to a publishing house an ordinary work to be done, but with an artistic excellence, particularly of illustration, which does not enter even into bank-note engraving, or anything of the sort to which we are accustomed. For example, it is designed to take a minute particle of morbid flesh, or bone, a particle, the integrity of which has been destroyed by disease, subject it to a very high magnifying power, and photograph it thus magnified, and then engrave it for insertion in the work. In this way a particle, so small perhaps as not to be usefully discernible by the naked eye, may be represented in a large engraving, and may furnish to surgeons, physiologists, and pathologists the most valuable information which is now hidden from all except those possessed of very expensive and scientific facilities, or else of very rare advantages.

I am assured by the distinguished head of the insane asylum situated in my district, the third or fourth, I believe, in the world, who has given attention to this subject, that the value of the process to which I have just adverted, if that alone were to be effectuated by this work, is greater than can easily be measured, looking to the benefits which will result from it. Therefore, unless we are to drop altogether the business of book-making—and if that question were up I might agree with the gentleman from Iowa, [Mr. PRICE]—unless we are to discontinue the practice altogether, it seems to me there is a clear propriety in an appropriation adequate to the thorough execution of the work.

Mr. PRICE. The committee will remember that I have said nothing in reference to the publication of books in general.

Mr. STEVENS. The gentleman has already spoken twice on this question. I ask him, when he concludes his remarks, to move that the committee rise for the purpose of terminating debate.

Mr. PRICE. I would be willing to accommodate the gentleman from Pennsylvania in any way, but I think the House and this committee will bear me witness that I am not in the habit of making long speeches and not a great many short ones. The argument of the gentleman from New York [Mr. CONKLING] is simply this: that because we have been in the habit of publishing here all sorts and kinds and sizes of books at an expense which has made us ridiculous in the eyes of the nation, $2,000,000 having been expended for that purpose, we must therefore expend $500,000 more on a medical work that not more than one man in a hundred can understand anything about when he reads it. The fact that we have done wrong in publishing books heretofore is no justification for continuing in that wrong and expending the money of the people of this country when everybody knows we have not any money to expend. This is purely a scientific work. It will be useful to and for the benefit of one profession only, and outside of that profession it will be read but very little, and when read will be less understood.

Mr. CONKLING. I wish to know whether, when the gentleman says that this work will not be understood by one man in a hundred, he means that it will not be used or be useful in the case of all those who resort to medical works or scientific libraries on subjects of physiology or pathology.

Mr. PRICE. When I admit that it will be useful to all such persons, then I have proved by the gentleman that it will not be useful to one man in a hundred. Is there one man in a hundred that resorts to medical libraries to examine scientifically these questions? Everybody knows that there is not one man in five hundred who desires it, and it is for that reason that I protest against this lavish, and, I may say, foolish expenditure of the public money. If the reasons given by the gentleman are good for anything, let us publish medical works and mail them broadcast over the land, and let the people understand that we are to become a nation of surgeons and physicians.

Mr. STEVENS. I move that the committee rise for the purpose of closing debate.

The motion was agreed to.

So the committee rose; and the Speaker having resumed the chair, Mr. RAYMOND reported that the Committee of the Whole on the state of the Union had had under consideration the special order, being bill of the House No. 737, making appropriations for sundry civil expenses of the Government for the year ending June 30, 1867, and for other purposes, and had come to no conclusion thereon.

MESSAGE FROM THE SENATE.

A message from the Senate, by Mr. FORNEY, their Secretary, informed the House that the Senate insisted upon their amendments disagreed to by the House to the bill of the House (H. R. No. 213) making appropriations for the legislative, executive, and judicial expenses of the Government for the year ending the 30th of June, 1867, disagreed to other amendments of the House to other amendments of the Senate to the said bill, and agreed to the conference asked by the House on the disagreeing votes of the two Houses thereon, and had appointed Messrs. FESSENDEN, WILLIAMS, and HENDRICKS the conferees on the part of the Senate.

The message further informed the House that the Senate insisted on their disagreement to the tenth amendment of the House to the bill of the Senate (S. No. 343) to quiet land titles in California, agreed to the conference asked by the House on the disagreeing votes of the two Houses thereon, and had appointed Messrs. POMEROY, CONNESS, and SPRAGUE the conferees on the part of the Senate.

The message further informed the House that the Senate had passed a joint resolution (S. No. 125) granting the right of way through military reserves to the Union Pacific Railroad Company and its branches, in which he was instructed to ask the concurrence of the House.

Mr. ANCONA. I rise to a question of order. I desire to inquire whether it would not be in order now to demand that the regular order be taken up. Unanimous consent was given for the consideration of this bill, on the supposition, I suppose, that it would give rise to but little debate. Would it be in order to call for the regular order now, as this bill is likely to give rise to considerable debate?

The SPEAKER. It would not be in order to demand the consideration of the regular order at this time, because the House has given unanimous consent for the consideration of this miscellaneous appropriation bill.

MISCELLANEOUS APPROPRIATIONS—AGAIN.

Mr. STEVENS. I move that when the House shall again resolve itself into the Committee of the Whole on the state of the Union, all general debate upon the special order shall be closed.

The motion was agreed to.

Mr. STEVENS. I also move that when the House shall again resolve itself into Committee of the Whole on the state of the Union for the consideration of the special order, all debate upon the pending paragraph shall be closed in five minutes.

The motion was agreed to.

Mr. STEVENS moved that the rules be suspended and that the House resolve itself into the Committee of the Whole on the state of the Union on the special order.

The motion was agreed to.

So the rules were suspended; and the House accordingly resolved itself into the Committee of the Whole on the state of the Union, (Mr. RAYMOND in the chair,) and resumed the consideration of the special order, being a bill of the House (No. 737) making appropriations for sundry civil expenses of the Government for the year ending June 30, 1867, and for other purposes.

The pending question was upon the motion of Mr. PRICE, to strike out the following paragraph:

For the purpose of printing and publishing at the Government Printing Office, the first volumes of the Medical and Surgical History of the Rebellion, under the direction of the Surgeon General, $60,000.

Mr. BANKS. I do not think the objection made by the gentleman from Iowa [Mr. PRICE] to this paragraph is sufficiently strong to justify the Committee of the Whole in striking it out. The kind of information that is provided for in this work is not necessary for all people. And if it is imparted to one person in a hundred it perhaps serves all the purposes of the Government, and attains all the good that can be attained by a work of this kind. I have been told, and I believe it is true, that if the information embraced in this work had been in the possession of our Army surgeons at the commencement of the late war it might have saved twenty per cent. of the life that has been lost. Now, if that is true in regard to the past, it will certainly be true in the future, if we shall be called to participate in another war; and it is also true in relation to the preservation of life in times of peace. It is a work calculated to instruct medical men in the best methods of preserving life, which is a consideration of very great importance to the country.

The question recurred upon the motion of Mr. PRICE to strike out the paragraph.

The question was taken; and upon a division there were—ayes ten, noes not counted. So the motion was not agreed to.

The Clerk resumed the reading of the bill. Mr. HUMPHREY. I move to insert before the paragraphs headed, "surveys of the coast," the following:

For the enlargement and repairs of the custom-house and post office building at Bangor, Maine, $35,000.

The application coming from the city of Bangor, for the purpose of enlarging and repairing the custom-house and post office building, was referred to the Committee on Commerce. That committee examined into the facts of the matter with a great deal of care, so that there should be no question as to the propriety of making an appropriation for that purpose. An officer of the Treasury Department was sent to the city of Bangor to examine the building and make a report. That report was made, and upon that report, with other information that was presented to us, the committee have reported in favor of making this appropriation. As the report is a short one I ask that it be read by the Clerk, as it contains all the facts.

The Clerk read as follows:

Mr. HUMPHREY, from the Committee on Commerce, made the following report:

The Committee on Commerce, to whom was referred the memorial of the city council of Bangor, Maine, praying for an appropriation for the enlargement and repair of the custom-house and post office department of that place, report that they have had the matter under consideration, and, submitting the accompanying papers as a part of this report, would recommend an appropriation of $35,000 to carry out the proposed objects.

ROOM OF COMMITTEE ON COMMERCE,
HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES.

SIR: I herewith inclose a memorial from the city council of Bangor, Maine, relative to improvement of the custom-house at that place, and would request your views as to the propriety of an appropriation, in the present state of the finances, for the purposes mentioned.

Very respectfully,
E. B. WASHBURN, M. C.
Hon. H. McCULLOCH, Secretary of the Treasury.

CITY OF BANGOR, IN CITY COUNCIL,
November 6, 1865.

Resolved, That the following memorial to Congress, with the accompanying plans, be, and the same are hereby, adopted as the sense of the city council of the city of Bangor; and the Representative from this congressional district is requested to present the same to and urge the adoption by Congress at its approaching session of measures necessary to carry into effect the prayer of said memorial.

IN BOARD OF ALDERMEN, November 6, 1865.
Adopted unanimously; sent down for concurrence.
SAMUEL H. DALE, Mayor.

IN COMMON COUNCIL, November 6, 1865.
Adopted unanimously, in concurrence.
N. L. PERKINS, President.

To the honorable the Senate and House of Representatives of the United States in Congress assembled:

The memorial of the city council of Bangor, in the county of Penobscot, and State of Maine, respectfully represents: that the building of the United States in this city which is occupied as a custom-house, post office, and by the United States district court, is too limited in its accommodations for the purposes for which it was intended, and that there are no Government rooms in this district for the internal revenue suitable for that department; that the post office accommodations are contracted and extremely inconvenient for the citizens, a portion of whom are obliged to stand out of doors during the distribution of the mails; that the court-room is low, small, dark, and may properly be termed mean, taking into view the purpose for which it was designed; that a plan prepared by a United States engineer (the supervising architect) has been exhibited to your memorialists, which, in their opinion, contemplates such improvements in the present Government building as will render it very convenient for all the Government purposes above mentioned. They therefore pray that Congress will make provision for enlarging the present custom-house in Bangor, and arranging it agreeably to said plan.

And, as in duty bound, will ever pray.
GEORGE W. SNOW, City Clerk.

A true copy of record.
Attest: GEORGE W. SNOW, City Clerk.

TREASURY DEPARTMENT,
OFFICE OF SUPERVISING ARCHITECT,
February 23, 1866.

SIR: I have visited Bangor, Maine, and examined the custom-house building in that city as directed by your letter of the 29th ultimo, and have the honor to report as follows:

I found the building small, inconvenient, and badly arranged. The ground floor, which is assigned to the post office department, is not only too small, but constructed without regard to the wants of the officers and the public. I consider increased accommodations an absolute necessity.

The second or custom-house story is ample for all the business of the port, and is, in fact, the only portion of the building that is at all adapted for the purpose for which it is designed. It is clean and in good repair, but the stairs by which it is approached are extremely inconvenient and even dangerous, and should the improvements be made, must be reconstructed.

The building is two stories and a half in height, the upper or attic story being devoted to the judiciary, and contains what is termed a court-room, though a more ill-conceived, inconvenient, and unfit building it would be difficult to imagine. The top of the windows is but four feet from the floor, and the room has no other means of ventilation; from which statements some idea can be formed of its fitness for the purpose. In fact, the court-room exists but in name, and is only used in cases of great emergency that cannot be transferred to Portland, and on such occasions as the judge cannot obtain the use of the county court-room. I therefore strongly recommend that suitable accommodations be provided.

I have also fully examined into the feasibility of extending the present building, and can see no objections to such a course. It would be not only more economical and more satisfactory to the citizens, but in all respects more advantageous. I have therefore prepared plans for an extension of the building with a view to furnish suitable accommodations for the post office, United States courts and judiciary, and the officers of the internal revenue, the estimated cost of which is $35,000, which I believe will furnish the desired accommodations in the most economical and satisfactory manner, and which are herewith submitted for your approval.

Very respectfully,
A. B. MULLETT,
Assistant Supervising Architect.

Hon. HUGH McCULLOCH, Secretary of the Treasury.

TREASURY DEPARTMENT, March 2, 1866.

SIR: Upon the receipt of your letter inclosing the memorial of the city council of Bangor, Maine, requesting an extension of the custom-house at that place, I caused the proper investigations to be made, and believe, after a careful examination of the case, that the public interests demand the extension asked for. I therefore recommend that an appropriation of $35,000 be granted for that purpose.

Inclosed please find copies of the papers in relation to the case, and of the report of the architect of this Department.

Very respectfully,
H. McCULLOCH,
Secretary of the Treasury.

Hon. E. B. WASHBURN, Chairman of the Committee on Commerce, House of Representatives.

OFFICE OF THE UNITED STATES ATTORNEY,
DISTRICT OF MAINE, PORTLAND.

I have the honor to represent that the room over the custom-house at Bangor, used as a court-room for the United States district court, is scandalously inconvenient and unfit for such purposes. It is too small for the accommodation of the officers of the court, to say nothing of the public. It is low, unventilated, and from faults of construction incapable of ventilation. Citizens of Bangor who have happened into the room while court was in session, and seen the judge, officers, and jurors sweating and panting in the hot weather of July, have begged, for the honor of their city, that we would accept the use of the county court building, which it has not often been in our power to do, because the State court was sitting simultaneously. The only light admitted to any of the rooms upon the upper story is by a few low windows close to the floor, and hard up, externally, under the eaves of the building. There has not been a year, since I have been in office, that I have not strained and injured my eyesight by the considerable amount of writing of minutes of testimony and indictments that I have been required to do in the United States court-room and the adjoining ante-rooms. In my opinion the building at Bangor should be remodeled, so as to give wider, higher, better ventilated, and better lighted rooms for the accommodation of the United States court.

GEORGE F. TALBOT,
Attorney of the United States for Maine District.

DISTRICT OF MAINE:
We concur fully with the opinion above expressed by the district attorney, as to the inconvenience of the United States court-room at Bangor, on account of its smallness and lack of sufficient light and ventilation, and respectfully urge such alterations in the building as shall make these rooms more suitable for the purpose for which they were built.

CHARLES CLARK,
United States Marshal.

WILLIAM P. PREBLE,
Clerk United States District Court.

I concur in the general representations of the district attorney as to the inconvenience of the court-rooms at Bangor. If alterations are made in the building, a room much more convenient and suitable might be made at little expense. The present room is hot and very ill-ventilated, and the court sitting in high summer makes it hot and almost suffocating.

ASHUR WARE,

Judge United States District Court, Maine.

HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES,
WASHINGTON CITY, January 8, 1866.

SIR: I have the honor to submit for your consideration the memorial of the mayor, aldermen, and common council of the city of Bangor, Maine, asking for additional office accommodations for the United States officials in that city. A draught and plan has been recently made in your Department for the enlargement of the custom-house, to meet the necessity, but estimates of the expense have not been made, and cannot be with any degree of understanding and accuracy without personal inspection of the site and premises by a competent architect and engineer. I respectfully ask that such competent person may be detailed by you to examine and report upon the subject, as well for your own information as to enable Congress to act understandingly upon the memorial referred to.

Very respectfully, your obedient servant,

JOHN H. RICE.

Hon. HUGH McCULLOCH, Secretary of the Treasury.

The amendment of Mr. HUMPHREY was agreed to.

The Clerk resumed the reading of the bill.

Mr. O'NEILL. I am authorized by the Committee on Commerce to offer the following amendment:

Insert after line one hundred and forty-three the following:

To provide additional station-houses, life-boats, and other appliances for the better preservation of life and property from shipwreck along the coast of New Jersey, between Sandy Hook and Little Egg Harbor, $10,000; and for repairing and relighting the light-house on Tucker's Beach, on the coast of New Jersey, $5,000.

The amendment was agreed to.

The Clerk resumed the reading of the bill.

Mr. KASSON. The paragraph embracing lines two hundred and sixty-six to two hundred and seventy-one is in the present form somewhat imperfect in its language. I move to amend by striking out the words "at a sum not to exceed" and inserting after the word "dollars" the words "or so much thereof as may be necessary;" so that the paragraph will read as follows:

For care, support, and medical treatment of sixty transient paupers, medical and surgical patients, in some proper medical institution in the city of Washington, under a contract to be formed with such institution by the Commissioner of Public Buildings, $12,000, or so much thereof as may be necessary.

Mr. WILSON, of Iowa. I desire to ask my colleague what is the object of the provision contained in this paragraph. I would like to have some explanation of it.

Mr. KASSON. We have been in the habit annually of making an appropriation for this purpose. Some such appropriation is always required. Many soldiers, coming to Washington to collect some claim or something of that kind, become destitute while here and they are permitted to find refuge in some institution under regulations provided by the Department. Besides, there are other creatures who humanity dictates should be cared for.

Mr. WILSON, of Iowa. Why is the number limited to sixty?

Mr. KASSON. Simply because there is an express agreement with an institution in this city to take that number at a cost not exceeding the sum named in the bill.

Mr. WILSON, of Iowa. If only one half the number should be received, will the institution still receive the same amount?

Mr. KASSON. It receives only so much as it is entitled to under the arrangement made with it by the Department.

The amendment of Mr. KASSON was agreed to.

The Clerk continued the reading of the bill, Mr. WASHBURNE, of Illinois. I move to amend by inserting after the word "closets," in line two hundred and eighty, the words "for putting a proper number of water-closets in the upper story of the Representatives'

Chamber;" also by striking out in the two hundred and eighty-fourth line the word "eight" and inserting "twelve;" so that the paragraph will read:

For annual repairs of the Capitol water-closets; for putting a proper number of water-closets in the upper story of the Representatives' Chamber; for stables, water-pipes, pavements and other walks within the Capitol square, broken glass, and locks, and for the protection of the building, and keeping the main approaches to it unencumbered, in addition to the sale of old material, $12,000.

The amendment was agreed to.

The Clerk continued the reading of the bill.

Mr. KELLEY. In the absence of the chairman of the Committee on the Library, [Mr. HAYES,] who is to-day detained from the House by indisposition, I am instructed by the committee to move to amend by inserting after line four hundred and thirty-three the following:

For contingent fund for Joint Committee on the Library, $5,000.

Mr. STEVENS. I understand the gentleman to say that this amendment is reported from the Committee on the Library.

Mr. KELLEY. It is. The last appropriation for this contingent fund was made as long ago as 1856; and the fund is now exhausted within, I think, two hundred and fifty or three hundred dollars.

Mr. STEVENS. I was aware that this fund was nearly exhausted, and I expected such a proposition as this.

The amendment was agreed to.

The Clerk continued the reading of the bill.

Mr. WILSON, of Iowa. I move to strike out the following:

Currency Printing Bureau:

For the purpose of erecting on the public land adjacent to the Treasury Department, a fire-proof brick building of sufficient capacity to accommodate the Currency Printing Bureau, and also to afford to the Treasury additional room for storage, $200,000.

I think if the members would take up and read the testimony taken by the committee which investigated this department some two years ago, they would be satisfied that unless some change is made in the superintendency of it they ought not to agree to this appropriation thereby rendering it a permanent department of the Government. I hope it will be stricken out.

Mr. STEVENS. I hope that amendment will not be adopted. The Treasury Department is anxious that this appropriation should be made. The papers of the Internal Revenue Bureau are now kept in a hired building which is not fire-proof. The committee agree to the propriety of having this fire-proof building erected for the purposes of this Printing Bureau as well as for the safe-keeping of these papers. The necessity is urgent. We are now paying $23,000 a year for the rent of the house now occupied by the Internal Revenue Bureau. It is not a fire-proof building, and a fire-proof building is necessary. The committee unanimously recommended the appropriation.

Mr. WASHBURNE, of Illinois. There may be something in the matter of having a fire-proof building to protect the papers of the Treasury Department, but I am unwilling to have anything go into this bill which looks like a perpetuation of this Printing Bureau. I hope the gentleman will consent to strike out that part of the clause, and let it provide only for additional room for storage.

Mr. KASSON. I send up a letter of the Secretary to be read, showing the necessity for this.

The Clerk read as follows:

TREASURY DEPARTMENT, May 23, 1866.

SIR: Allow me to call your attention to the circumstance that the office of Internal Revenue, with its records, bonds, and vouchers for at least $400,000,000, is now located in a building not fire-proof and which is not the property of the Government.

In case of the total destruction of the building in question by fire, a direct loss to the Government would, it is represented to me, be several millions, while the indirect loss to the Treasury and the country from the interruption and derangement of the revenue business would certainly be much greater.

The proper location of the Internal Revenue office, from its intimate connection with all the Treasury business, is in the Treasury building; but at present there is no space available in this building for its accommodation. If, however, the Currency Printing Bureau and the space occupied for storage could be transferred from the Treasury to some other adjacent building, properly constructed and fitted up, the office of the Internal Revenue could be brought back to its original location, thus avoiding the danger above pointed out and greatly facilitating the transaction of the business of the whole Department.

I therefore respectfully suggest to the Committee on Appropriations the expediency of authorizing the Secretary of the Treasury to erect on the public land adjacent to the Treasury Department a fire-proof brick building of sufficient capacity to accommodate the Currency Printing Bureau, and to also afford to the Treasury additional room for storage.

The estimates of the architect of the Treasury, which I herewith transmit, indicate that an appropriation of $200,000 will be necessary to defray the expenditure required for the erection of such a building, and I would respectfully request that an appropriation for that amount and for such purpose be recommended to Congress by the committee.

I am, very respectfully,
H. McCULLOCH,
Secretary of the Treasury.

Hon. THADDEUS STEVENS,
Chairman Committee on Appropriations.

Mr. STEVENS. Let the clause read as follows:

Currency Printing Bureau:

For the purpose of erecting on the public land adjacent to the Treasury Department, a fire-proof brick building, to be under the direction of the Secretary of the Treasury, to also afford to the Treasury additional room for storage, $200,000.

Mr. WASHBURNE, of Illinois. The chairman substantially agrees to the amendment I have suggested. I ask that it shall read as follows:

Currency Printing Bureau:

For the purpose of erecting on the public land adjacent to the Treasury Department, a fire-proof brick building of sufficient capacity to afford to the Treasury additional room for storage and the preservation of papers, &c.

Mr. STEVENS. Strike out the part in reference to storage, as they want to put clerks in there.

Mr. WASHBURNE, of Illinois. Very well.

The amendment was agreed to.

Mr. WASHBURNE, of Illinois, moved to strike out the heading.

The amendment was agreed to.

Mr. WASHBURNE, of Illinois, moved to reduce the appropriation to $100,000.

The amendment was disagreed to.

The question recurring on the motion of Mr. WILSON, of Iowa, to strike out the paragraph, it was not agreed to.

Mr. WASHBURNE, of Illinois. I move to amend by adding the following:

And the legal representatives of the corporations of Washington and of Georgetown, and the portion of the county of Washington in the District of Columbia not included in said corporations be, and they are hereby, directed to provide and suitably furnish, without delay, a suitable room for the use of the orphans' court, and two contiguous rooms and a fire-proof vault for the use of the register of wills in and for said county; and for the repayment of the expenses to be incurred in executing this order, the said corporations of Washington and Georgetown, and the levy court in the county of Washington, in the District of Columbia, are hereby authorized and directed to levy and collect a suitable tax upon the property embraced within their respective jurisdictions.

The amendment was agreed to.

The Clerk resumed the reading of the bill. The following clause was read:

For surveying the public lands in Nevada, at rates not exceeding fifteen dollars per lineal mile for standard lines, twelve dollars for township, and ten dollars for section lines, $15,000.

Mr. McRUER. I move to amend by striking out the word "twelve" and inserting "fourteen;" also by striking out "ten" and inserting "twelve;" so that it will read "fourteen dollars for township and twelve dollars for section lines." I have in my hand a letter from the United States surveyor-general of the State of California, in which he says that the present rates in California, which are fourteen dollars and twelve dollars, are as low as this work can be done. I believe this amendment meets the approbation of the chairman of the Committee on Appropriations, and I hope it will be adopted.

Mr. STEVENS. According to the best information we have had, the committee agreed to report the old rates, but the surveyor general since that has thought that some small change was necessary. I do not profess to be informed, and therefore I have nothing further to say.

Mr. McRUER. The surveyor general says that—"In the present condition of the country these prices are as low as deputy surveyors can live at the business. They are compelled to pay gold for assistance and other expenses, while they are paid in greenbacks. As long as the currency continues in the present condition prices in California and Nevada ought not to be changed."

Mr. WASHBURNE, of Illinois. I would like to know upon whose suggestion this reduction of the rates was made. The Commissioner of the Land Office had all the information before him, I suppose, before he came to the conclusion that this was a sufficient rate to enable him to get this work done.

Mr. BIDWELL. Mr. Chairman, surveying in California is different from what it is in most States and Territories. It is very important to our State that the surveying should be carried on as fast as possible, in order to settle conflicting land titles. If there is one thing more than another that is important to our State it is that this should be done. What has brought us most into trouble has been the want of surveys for the purpose of adjusting land titles. We are so situated that it is frequently almost impossible to obtain surveyors. We are suffering from spasmodic emigration. New mining localities are discovered which call away sometimes ten or fifteen or twenty thousand of our people; consequently all kinds of service rule higher there than elsewhere. The old rates paid, as they necessarily must be in the surveying of the country, are said by those who know, and among them the United States surveyor general for California, who is entirely reliable, to be so low that it would be almost impossible to get surveying done. I hope, therefore, that the rates will be changed as proposed by the amendment of my colleague.

Mr. KASSON. I ask the gentleman if he has any information from the Commissioner of the General Land Office. I will state to the gentleman frankly that my objection to this change, being made is, that it is not in a condition to be revised by our committee. In other words, we have no communication from the Commissioner of the Land Office on the subject, to whom the report of the surveyor general should have come, in order to justify our action in a regular way.

Mr. BIDWELL. My colleague has a letter from the surveyor general.

Mr. KASSON. But it does not come through the Commissioner of Public Lands to enable him to adjust an equal system for all the States and Territories, and I suggest to the gentleman whether it would not be better to wait and get a recommendation from the Land Office.

Mr. BIDWELL. It is very important that surveys should be carried on as fast as possible.

Mr. HENDERSON. I bear my testimony in behalf of the necessity of keeping up the old rates of surveying. I wish to say to the House that there is a great amount of suffering at the present time on the Pacific coast for want of surveying. I received a letter yesterday from the surveyor general of Oregon stating that there are settlements of forty miles in extent in which there is not a particle of land surveyed, and that at least $100,000 are needed to carry on the surveying in that State alone. Now, the point I make is this, that at these old rates surveying cannot be done. Surveyors cannot be got to do the work unless the rates are at least as high as the amendment proposes. The country is being settled up and the surveying needs to be completed. Public as well as private welfare demands it. I have a very high opinion of the Commissioner of the General Land Office, but I must say that his policy has been too stinted and close in reference to the public surveys on that coast.

Mr. WASHBURNE, of Illinois. I desire to say one word. The amendment of the gentleman from California changes the whole tenor of this bill, and I am certain the committee is not inclined, without further information, to override a bill drawn up by the Commissioner of the General Land Office fixing these rates.

The Commissioner is in a position to know what suitable rates are, and what the surveying can be done for, and he has drawn up this bill in conformity with that knowledge, and for us now to override what he and the Committee on Appropriations have done would be very improper, in my judgment.

The CHAIRMAN. Debate is exhausted on the amendment.

Mr. HIGBY. I move, pro forma, to strike out "fifteen," in the first line, and insert "sixteen." I do not know what higher authority the Commissioner of the Land Office can have than that which comes through the surveyor general of the States of California and Nevada. He would be very likely to go to them to get the prices, for the simple reason that a great portion of this work has not been done by the surveyor general himself, but by deputies and employés under him. And I will remark another thing: this does not contemplate an increase of the amount of the appropriation. There is no alteration in the amount, and I have it from the surveyor general himself that he thinks the gross amount will be sufficient for this year. The only question is as to the prices to be paid to these men who do the work. If we go to the Land Office there will be no other information obtained than what comes from the reports received from California through the surveyor general there.

Mr. BOUTWELL. It seems to me the great objection to this amendment is this: if the surveyor general of California and Nevada knew or had reason to believe that the work could not be done at these prices, he should have made his report to his superior, through whom the information would come to this House. To act upon information contained in a letter of an officer of the Government presented here in an irresponsible way is the most unsafe of all modes of legislation.

Mr. HENDERSON. I want to say that the recommendation of the Commissioner of the General Land Office does not come up to the recommendation of the officer on the Pacific coast. When the officer asks for $30,000 for public surveys the Commissioner cuts it down to $15,000; and when he asks twelve or fourteen dollars for section lines, it is cut down to ten dollars. The Commissioner does not give them what they ask for. And then for gentlemen to get up here and say that they know better than we do is a perfect absurdity, for we know the work cannot be done. This House and the Commissioner of the General Land Office may do as they see fit; but we know that these facts exist.

Mr. STEVENS. I move that the committee rise for the purpose of closing debate on this section, or these lines will run into other regions than California.

Several MEMBERS. We will take the vote now.

Mr. HIGBY. I withdraw my amendment.

The question being taken on the amendment of Mr. McRUER, it was disagreed to.

The Clerk resumed the reading.

The following clause was read:

For surveying public lands in Oregon, at rates not exceeding fifteen dollars per lineal mile for standard lines, twelve dollars for township, and ten dollars for section lines, $15,000.

Mr. HENDERSON. I move to strike out "$15,000" and to insert "$30,000." That is considerably less than was asked for.

The amendment was disagreed to.

The Clerk resumed the reading of the bill.

Mr. DONNELLY. I move to amend the bill by inserting after line four hundred and eighty-seven the following:

For surveying the public lands in Idaho Territory, at rates not exceeding fifteen dollars per lineal mile for standard lines, ten dollars for township lines, and eight dollars for section lines, $15,000.

For compensation of the surveyor general of Idaho and the clerk in his office, $6,400.

For rent of surveyor general's office in Idaho, fuel, books, stationery, and other incidental expenses, including pay of messenger, $1,500.

I desire to explain that since the estimates were furnished upon which this bill has been based a bill has passed Congress and been approved by the President, (House bill No. 391), providing for the establishment of a surveyor general's district in Idaho.

Mr. KASSON. I would suggest to the gentleman that there are several cases of that kind to be provided for, and the Committee on Appropriations intend to report them, so far as known, in the general deficiency bill, the only remaining bill. I suggest to the gentleman to defer his amendment until we reach that bill.

Mr. DONNELLY. If that is the case I will withdraw my amendment at the present time.

The Clerk resumed the reading of the bill.

Mr. STEVENS. I move to strike out the paragraph relating to the publication of census returns, as follows:

For defraying the expenses of preparing for publication a statistical classification of the eighth census returns, and for the publication of a supplemental volume of the eighth census prior to second session of Thirty-Ninth Congress, in part, $12,920, being for the annual compensation of the existing force of seven census clerks and one laborer.

I rather think it better be out, and if the Senate want it in, they can put it in.

The motion to strike out was agreed to.

The Clerk resumed the reading of the bill.

The following was read:

For the purchase, inclosure, and preservation of a parcel of ground at Des Moines, the capital of Iowa, as a site for the erection of a building for the use of Federal courts and for other Federal offices, $15,000, or so much thereof as may be necessary, to be expended under the direction of the Secretary of the Interior.

Mr. WASHBURNE, of Illinois. I would inquire if there are any public buildings there now.

Mr. KASSON. This is to provide for the usual site, as we have always done for buildings in the capitals of western States.

Mr. WASHBURNE, of Illinois. I want to know what the usual site is. I understand that there are no public buildings there.

Mr. KASSON. This is the same provision we have habitually passed for the capitals of western States for the accommodation of the United States officers. It is recommended by a letter of the Secretary of the Interior as needed for the public service.

Mr. WASHBURNE, of Illinois. I undertake to say that there is no such legislation found on record. When Congress desires to have a public building built it makes an appropriation of so much money for the purchase of the ground and the erection of the building. This is a side entrance, to get the ground in the first place, and then they will come here for an appropriation for the building.

Mr. KASSON. I supposed this would meet the approbation of the gentleman from Illinois, [Mr. WASHBURNE,] as he has asked for $50,000 for his State.

Mr. WASHBURNE, of Illinois. I did not ask anything of the kind.

Mr. KASSON. It is in the bill.

Mr. STEVENS. I appeal to the well-known liberality of the gentleman from Illinois [Mr. WASHBURNE] not to object to this provision. [Laughter.]

Mr. WASHBURNE, of Illinois. I am very much obliged to the gentleman for the acknowledgment, which is properly due. But I must move to strike out this paragraph.

The motion to strike out was not agreed to.

Mr. COBB. I move to amend this section by adding the following:

For the purpose of renewing the appropriation for building a court-house at Madison, Wisconsin, $50,000, or so much thereof as has not been expended.

And I ask consent to make a short explanation of the amendment which I have offered. In 1856 an appropriation was made by Congress to build a court-house for the accommodation of the circuit and district courts of the United States at Madison, the capital of Wisconsin. This exact sum of $50,000 was then appropriated. For some reason or other entirely unknown to me, though I think I can guess it, the Administration declined or neglected to expend any part of that appropriation, and consequently it lapsed. For some reason or other the appropriation has never been renewed. I now simply ask to have it renewed, so that the matter may be placed where the statute of 1856 placed it, leaving it to the Administration to decide whether it will obey the laws of Congress, or whether it will neglect to do so, as the Administration of James Buchanan did.

Mr. STEVENS. I ask the gentleman whether there has been any communication from the Secretary of the Interior on this subject.

Mr. COBB. There has not been, so far as I know; but the facts, I think, will not be disputed by any one.

Mr. STEVENS. It is not customary to make appropriations of this kind without having some recommendation of a Department or something of the kind.

Mr. COBB. I have offered the amendment and stated the facts, which are of record. If the House does not choose to grant the appropriation we shall endeavor to do the best we can without it; but it seems to me that ten years is a considerable length of time to wait for the administration of a law by the officers of the Government.

The amendment was not agreed to, there being—ayes fourteen, noes not counted.

Mr. LYNCH. I move to amend by adding the following at the end of section one:

For the Government building at Portland, Maine, used as a post-office, custom-house, and for the United States courts, lately destroyed or rendered almost worthless by fire, to repair or rebuild the same, as may prove most advisable, $200,000, or so much thereof as may be necessary, to be expended under the direction of the Secretary of the Treasury.

Mr. WASHBURN, of Illinois. I suppose that nobody will oppose a proper appropriation for this purpose, but it strikes me that the appropriation proposed is much too large.

Mr. LYNCH. I ask the Clerk to read the letters which I send to the desk.

The Clerk read as follows:

TREASURY DEPARTMENT, July 12, 1866.

SIR: I inclose herewith a letter to Hon. JOHN LYNCH, M. C., from the collector of customs, postmaster, judge, marshal, and clerks of United States courts at Portland, Maine, in regard to the rebuilding or repair of the custom-house building at that place, to which I desire through you respectfully to ask the attention of Congress.

I have already directed an architect to proceed to Portland and cause such immediate and temporary repairs to be made as may be absolutely necessary, and at the same time to prepare and report estimates for the thorough repairing of the present building, if possible, or the erection of a new structure, if that shall be deemed best, for the use of the post office, United States courts, and officers of internal revenue; but it is not probable that the report and estimates can be made in time for the action of Congress at the present session.

I have therefore to recommend that an appropriation should be made of sufficient amount for the erection of a new building, or the repair and extension of the present custom-house, so as to accommodate the various public officers in Portland, whichever shall hereafter be deemed best for the public interest.

I would suggest that the sum of $200,000 should be appropriated, so much thereof only to be expended as shall be found necessary when it shall be determined whether it will be best to repair the present structure or erect a new building.

Very respectfully,

H. McCULLOCH,
Secretary of the Treasury.

Hon. THADDEUS STEVENS, Chairman Committee on Appropriations, House of Representatives.

CUSTOM-HOUSE, PORTLAND,
COLLECTOR'S OFFICE, July 7, 1866.

SIR: The custom-house building stands alone amid the desolation of two hundred acres of the central and business portion of the city. But it is uncertain whether it is not so much damaged by the fire that it will be necessary to rebuild it; at any rate it will require very extensive repairs. We would earnestly recommend that you ask for an appropriation of $200,000, or so much thereof as shall be deemed necessary by the Secretary of the Treasury, for rebuilding or restoring and furnishing the structure. It is possible that it may be required, but it may be found to be impracticable. The Federal courts and officers, and the post office and the internal revenue are in need of the accommodations which this appropriation will secure.

Yours, truly;

I. WASHBURN, Jr.,
Collector of Customs.

WOODBURY DAVIS,
Postmaster.

NATHAN CLIFFORD,
Associate Justice Supreme Court United States.

EDWARD FOX,
District Judge of Maine.

CHARLES CLARK,
United States Marshal.

WILLIAM P. PREBLE,
Clerk United States District Court, Maine.

GEORGE F. EMORY,
Clerk United States Circuit Court.

Hon. JOHN LYNCH, M. C.

Mr. SPALDING. Mr. Chairman, I doubt whether the Secretary of the Treasury was aware, when he wrote that letter, that $75,000 had already been appropriated, in a bill heretofore passed, for building a custom-house in Portland, and $25,000 to repair the old one, making $100,000. Of course the Secretary of the Treasury cannot suppose that $200,000 is necessary in addition to the $100,000 already appropriated. I may state that the Committee on Appropriations this morning instructed one of their members to inquire into this matter and see what amount is necessary, in addition to former appropriations, to rebuild this custom-house or put it in repair. Whenever we can form a correct judgment as to the amount necessary to be appropriated, I am ready to vote the sum required.

Mr. KASSON. In making the inquiry which has been referred to by the gentleman from Ohio, [Mr. SPALDING,] I find that the intention of the former appropriation was to build an entirely new custom-house on property now belonging to the United States. The sum appropriated for that purpose has not been expended. The building recently destroyed by fire has been used for a custom-house and, I believe, for some other Federal offices; but the building had become very much crowded; and this custom-house proper was to be built at any rate. But nothing was destroyed by the fire connected with that appropriation. This, then, is for the purpose of rebuilding the house now used as a custom-house, and which will be used for the purposes of the internal revenue, &c. I presume the gentleman from Maine can be more explicit than myself.

I think, if I may be permitted to say anything against the recommendation of the Secretary of the Treasury, that this is a larger sum than we ought to appropriate for restoring a building which is not to be the custom-house at Portland. I ask the gentleman from Maine whether it would not be right and proper and expedient for us to limit it to one half the appropriation made by the House until we know whether it is necessary to expend this large sum for the mere restoration of the building we now have.

I will simply add another word. The gentleman from Maine is well aware that the distinguished Senator from that State and that city will be ready to correct it if we get it wrong when it gets to the Senate.

Mr. LYNCH. Mr. Chairman, the question of how much we shall make this appropriation is entirely with the House. The matter has been brought to my attention by a letter signed by the collector of the port, the postmaster at Portland, a judge of the Supreme Court, and other officers of the Government; and they have officially notified the Secretary of the Treasury that if the building is to be rebuilt it will probably cost $200,000. In reply to the gentleman from Ohio, [Mr. SPALDING,] who says that $100,000 has already been appropriated for a custom-house, I desire to say this has nothing to do with that appropriation.

Mr. SPALDING. Was not $25,000 appropriated for this very building?

Mr. LYNCH. No, sir. Five thousand dollars was appropriated at the present session of Congress for the alteration of the post office. This building is occupied as a post office, custom-house, and for the United States courts. The custom-house has been so crowded as to require a new building. It is necessary there should be a building for the custom-house alone; and the part of the building now occupied as a custom-house is needed for the internal revenue office. So that the appropriation for a custom-house is entirely distinct from this. It has nothing to do with it. This appropriation is necessary to rebuild this building to be used as a post office, for the United States courts, and for the Internal Revenue Bureau.

As to the appropriation being large, I will say this: if the building is rebuilt, and for the purposes of post office, &c., alone, the Government would not think of constructing it of the dimensions of the present one. It should be enlarged to meet the increasing wants of the people.

Now, Mr. Chairman, I here disclaim all intention to take advantage of the sympathy which exists in this community toward the people of Portland for the losses they have suffered in the late fire; I disclaim any intention to take advantage of that sympathy to get an appropriation for this building. While one half of our city has been burnt, we have still there all the resources from which it was built, and we intend to build it up again, and that immediately. What we want is that the Government, which has been a joint loser with us, shall restore its building as we restore ours. The city of Portland lost a public building which would now cost double this amount, yet the city intends to rebuild it at once. I wish, also, to say that a single individual in that city has lost more than double the amount of this appropriation, and still he intends to go on and rebuild. Men are already at work there. We do not want the public buildings of the Government to stand in our city as a disgrace to the country. We want the Government, as the people of Portland are doing, to rebuild the property which has been destroyed.

Mr. THAYER. I desire to understand this matter. I ask whether this appropriation has been considered by the Committee on Appropriations.

Mr. LYNCH. It has been agreed to by the committee, but they can answer for themselves.

Mr. THAYER. I ask the chairman of the committee whether it has been approved by them.

Mr. STEVENS. It was sent to the committee after this bill was reported, and we thought it better to let the gentleman from Maine offer it. I hope the gentleman from Maine will agree to reduce it to $100,000.

Mr. LYNCH. The Secretary of the Treasury declares that this amount is necessary.

Mr. STEVENS. I suggest to the gentleman from Maine, for his own benefit, that he reduce the amount of the appropriation to $100,000.

Mr. THAYER. I am not prepared to vote for a proposition of this kind unless it is reported by a committee. I do not think that the House can safely abandon the fixed rule of legislation in this respect in regard to appropriation bills, which requires that propositions for the appropriation of the public money shall first undergo the investigation and scrutiny of the committee of this House appointed for that purpose; and it was upon that account that I appealed to the chairman of the Committee on Appropriations to know whether this proposition had the sanction of that committee; because, if it has not I will not vote for it.

Mr. STEVENS. This proposition came to us, but we had no time to consider it. Of course something ought to be given for this purpose, and we asked the gentleman from Maine [Mr. LYNCH] to offer the amendment upon the recommendation of the Department. I think that some appropriation should be made for this purpose; but my own idea is that $100,000 is the proper amount.

Mr. THAYER. Then I hope the House will not exceed the amount recommended by the chairman of the committee. Obviously, if this House attempts to adopt any other rule of action in regard to the subject of appropriations than that which it has always adhered to, to require appropriations to be made upon the responsibility of the recommendation of a committee of this House, whose duty it is to examine all the estimates and details upon which the recommendations are based, there can be no safety in legislating upon these subjects; and I hope that the gentleman from Maine will either adopt the suggestion of the chairman of the Committee on Appropriations, or else that the subject may be deferred until that committee can have an opportunity to examine the estimates upon which the appropriation which is proposed by the gentleman from Maine is asked for.

Mr. LYNCH. I have no objection to accept the modification suggested by the gentleman from Pennsylvania, [Mr. STEVENS,] and will make the amount of the appropriation $100,000.

The amendment, as modified, was agreed to.

The Clerk read the second section of the bill, as follows:

Sec. 2. And be it further enacted, That the following sums be, and the same are hereby appropriated, out of any money in the Treasury not otherwise appropriated, for the objects hereinafter expressed, namely:

Office of United States depository, Louisville:

For salary of cashier, $1,800.
For salary of book-keeper, $1,500.
For salary of assistant cashier, $1,320.
For salary of clerk, $1,320.
For contingent expenses, $625.

Office United States depository, Chicago:

For salary of cashier, $1,600.
For salary of clerk, $1,000.
For contingent expenses, $400.

Office United States depository, Pittsburg:

For salary of cashier, $1,500.
For salary of assistant cashier, $1,000.
For salary of watchman, $900.
For contingent expenses, $200.

Office United States depository, Baltimore:

For salary of cashier, $1,800.
For salary of clerk, $1,500.
For salary of clerk, $1,200.
For salary of clerk, $1,000.
For salary of clerk, $900.
For salary of messenger, $900.
For contingent expenses, $350.

Office United States Assistant Treasurer, San Francisco:

For salary of cashier, $2,500.
For salary of book-keeper, $2,000.

Office United States depository, Cincinnati:

For salary of assistant cashier, $1,500.
For salary of assistant cashier, $1,200.
For salary of assistant cashier, $1,000.
For salary of teller, $1,300.
For salary of book-keeper, $1,500.
For salary of two clerks, $2,500.
For salary of clerk, $1,200.
For contingent expenses, $2,000.

Mr. WASHBURNE, of Illinois. I move to add at the end of that section the following:

Provided, That none of the salaries of the officers named in this section shall be increased.

Mr. STEVENS. That is a most unheard-of amendment, after we have made a specific appropriation, to top it with such an unlegislative amendment. It is hardly consistent with the usual accuracy of the gentleman from Illinois in regard to such matters. I hope the House will not adopt the amendment.

Mr. WASHBURNE, of Illinois. What I desire to understand, and what the committee, I presume, desire to understand in relation to this matter is, whether this provision in fact carries out the existing law and makes an appropriation for the salaries which these men now receive, or whether it increases the salaries of these officers. The gentlemen of the Committee on Appropriations do not say that this is an appropriation to pay the salaries now fixed by law. My own idea is that the salaries of all these men are increased by this section of the bill, and if it be the intention of the committee to put in this broad increase of salaries, I propose to insert the amendment I have offered, which is perfectly just and proper.

Mr. STEVENS. I have no knowledge of any increase being involved here.

Mr. WASHBURNE, of Illinois. Then my amendment can do no harm.

Mr. STEVENS. But it is a most ridiculous provision.

Mr. WASHBURNE, of Illinois. My belief is that this clause does increase the salaries of these men, and I desire to have a provision inserted that there shall be no increase of salaries. It can do no harm, at any rate.

The question was put on Mr. WASHBURNE's amendment, and there were—ayes 40, noes 25; no quorum voting.

Mr. WASHBURNE, of Illinois. I think the gentleman from Pennsylvania had better let this question go to the House.

Mr. STEVENS. I am willing that the whole section should be stricken out, but I do not wish to top it off with such a provision as this.

Mr. WASHBURNE, of Illinois. Then let the amendment be considered as adopted, and then we can have a vote upon it in the House.

Mr. STEVENS. Well, I have no objection to the amendment being adopted, but then I shall have to move to strike out the entire section.

The question was taken on Mr. WASHBURNE's amendment, and it was agreed to.

Mr. RANDALL, of Pennsylvania. I rise to a point of order; and that is that when the committee have put in an amendment, they cannot immediately after that strike it out.

Mr. STEVENS. I hope my colleague will allow me to take care of this question myself.

Mr. RANDALL, of Pennsylvania. Well, I propose to have something to do with it. I believe I have one vote on this floor, which is the same number that my colleague has. [Laughter.] The point of order I make is, that the House has just voted in an amendment, and that it is not in order to vote it out again immediately.

The CHAIRMAN. The Chair would remind the gentleman from Pennsylvania [Mr. RANDALL] that the section must be perfected before a motion to strike out is in order.

The question was taken on the motion to strike out, and it was agreed to.

The Clerk resumed the reading of the bill.

Mr. WASHBURNE, of Illinois. I move to amend the third section of the bill, on line eleven, page 24, by inserting before the word "the" the words, "and the twenty-fourth section of an act to amend an act entitled 'An act for enrolling and calling out the national forces, and for other purposes, approved March 3, 1863,' and approved July 24, 1864, be, and the same are hereby, repealed."

The amendment was agreed to.

The Clerk read as follows:

And be it further enacted, That from and after the 30th day of June, 1866, the compensation of the men of the Metropolitan police force of the District of Columbia, be, and the same is hereby, increased as follows, namely: twenty dollars per month; also, an additional increase of ten dollars a month, said additional increase to be borne by the cities of Washington and Georgetown, and the county of Washington, in the District of Columbia, in the proportion equal to the number of patrolmen allotted severally to the city of Washington, to the city of Georgetown, and the county of Washington and Georgetown, and the levy court of said county be, and they are hereby, authorized and empowered to levy a special tax not exceeding one quarter of one per cent. for the purpose aforesaid, and for no other purpose whatsoever.

Mr. BOUTWELL. I would like to ask what the pay of the Metropolitan police force is at present.

Mr. WASHBURNE, of Illinois. The increase of pay is to be paid by the corporations.

Mr. STEVENS. I move to amend that section by inserting after the word "Georgetown" the words "and to the county of Washington outside of the corporate limits of said cities." I move further to strike out the word "county" where it occurs in a line below this, and to insert in lieu thereof "city."

The amendments were agreed to.

Mr. WRIGHT. I desire to move an amendment, to come in on page 3 of the bill.

The CHAIRMAN. That will require unanimous consent.

Mr. WARD. I object.

Mr. WRIGHT. Then I move to add to the bill the following:

For the improvement of the navigation of Newark bay and Passaic and Hackensack rivers, $30,000.

Mr. WASHBURNE, of Illinois. That belongs to the river and harbor bill, if anywhere. I object to it that it is new legislation upon an appropriation bill, not carrying out any existing law. This subject has not been before the Committee on Commerce at all for consideration, nor has it been referred to any committee of the House.

The CHAIRMAN. The Chair sustains the point of order.

Mr. WARD. I move to strike out this sixth section. As I understand it, it is simply a provision to increase salaries in the District of Columbia of certain persons referred to in the section. I submit that this is no time to be raising salaries, and I therefore move to strike out the section.

The sixth section was as follows:

Sec. 6. And be it further enacted, That from and after the 30th day of June, 1866, the compensation of the men of the Metropolitan police force of the District of Columbia, be, and the same is hereby, increased as follows, namely: twenty dollars per month; also, an additional increase of ten dollars a month, said additional increase to be borne by the cities of Washington and Georgetown, and the county of Washington, in the District of Columbia, in the proportion equal to the number of patrolmen allotted severally to the city of Washington, to the city of Georgetown, and the county of Washington, outside of the corporate limits, and the cities of Washington and Georgetown, and the levy court of said county be, and they are hereby, authorized and empowered to levy a special tax not exceeding one quarter of one per cent. for the purpose aforesaid, and for no other purpose whatsoever.

Mr. MORRILL. I move that the committee rise for the purpose of enabling me to report a bill from the Committee of Ways and Means and have it printed so that we may have it before us to-morrow.

The motion was agreed to.

So the committee rose; and the Speaker having resumed the chair, Mr. RAYMOND reported that the Committee of the Whole on the state of the Union, according to order, had had under consideration the bill of the House (No. 737) making appropriations for sundry civil expenses of the Government for the year ending June 30, 1867, and for other purposes, and had come to no resolution thereon.

PROTECTION OF THE REVENUE.

Mr. MORRILL, by unanimous consent, reported from the Committee of Ways and Means a bill to protect the revenue, and for other purposes; which was read a first and second time, ordered to be printed, and made the special order in the House for to-morrow after the morning hour.

WITHDRAWAL OF PAPERS.

Mr. SCOFIELD asked and obtained leave to withdraw from the files of the House the petition and papers in the case of William Irvin.

Mr. INGERSOLL asked and obtained leave to withdraw from the files of the House the papers in the case of G. C. Lanphere.

LEAVE OF ABSENCE.

Mr. McKEE asked and obtained indefinite leave of absence for his colleague, Mr. SMITH.

MISCELLANEOUS APPROPRIATIONS—AGAIN.

Mr. STEVENS. I move that when the House again resolve itself into the Committee of the Whole on the state of the Union upon the miscellaneous appropriation bill all debate upon the bill and amendments shall be closed in one minute.

The motion was agreed to.

Mr. STEVENS. I move that the rules be suspended and the House resolve itself into Committee of the Whole on the state of the Union on the special order.

The motion was agreed to.

So the rules were suspended; and the House accordingly resolved itself into the Committee of the Whole on the state of the Union, (Mr. RAYMOND in the chair,) and resumed the consideration of the special order, being bill of the House No. 737, making appropriations for sundry civil expenses of the Government for the year ending June 30, 1867, and for other purposes.

The pending question was upon the motion of Mr. WARD to strike out the sixth section.

Mr. WARD called for tellers.

Tellers were ordered; and Messrs. WARD and INGERSOLL were appointed.

The committee divided; and the tellers reported—ayes 38, noes 59.

So the motion to strike out was not agreed to.

Mr. WARNER. I was not in the Hall at the time the consideration of this bill was begun or I should have offered an amendment in the proper place. I now move to add to the bill the following:

For the repair of the custom-house and post office, and the walks and fences adjoining the same, at Middletown, Connecticut, $5,000, the same to be expended by direction of the collector of the port of Middletown.

I desire to say with reference to this matter, that this is a very large building—

Mr. WASHBURNE, of Illinois. I must object to the gentleman's amendment, unless he will strike out the last part.

Mr. WARNER. I have no particular preference as to what officer shall be designated to direct the expenditure of the money; but the collector of the port, being on the spot, seems to me the proper officer.

The CHAIRMAN. Debate is closed by order of the House.

On the amendment there were—ayes twenty-six, noes not counted.

Mr. WARNER called for tellers.

Tellers were ordered; and Messrs. WARNER and HIGBY were appointed.

The committee divided; and the tellers reported—ayes 63, noes 30.

So the amendment was agreed to.

Mr. NIBLACK. I am directed by the Committee on Appropriations to offer the following as an additional section:

Sec. —. And be it further enacted, That the sum of $32,000 be, and is hereby, appropriated to pay Madison Sweetzer, upon condition that the said Madison Sweetzer shall first, by a good and sufficient deed, convey to the United States all his right, title, and interest in and to the following lands, conveyed by the United States to Joseph Richardville, sr., and Joseph Richardville, jr., by treaty at St. Mary's, October 6, 1818, to wit: the west half of section No. 26, the east half of section No. 28, and section No. 27, of township five south, range four east, lying in the county of Auglaize and State of Ohio.

Mr. WASHBURN, of Illinois. I rise to a point of order. I submit that is simply a proposition to pay a private claim. It is an endeavor to insert into an appropriation bill independent legislation. If this can be entertained as an amendment to a general appropriation bill, then any private claim whatever can be provided for in this way.

Mr. NIBLACK. The appropriation embodied in the amendment has been recommended to the Committee on Appropriations in regular form by the Secretary of the Interior. It has been considered by the committee and has received their approval. I cannot see why it is not appropriate as an amendment to this bill. It is in pursuance of an existing law of Congress, amended at the present session, providing for the appraisement of these lands and for the extinguishment of the title.

The CHAIRMAN. Does the gentleman from Indiana state that the appropriation proposed in the amendment is in pursuance of an existing law?

Mr. NIBLACK. It is.

The CHAIRMAN. The Chair thinks the point of order is not well taken.

Mr. WASHBURN, of Illinois. Does the Chair hold that this proposition is to carry out an existing law?

Mr. NIBLACK. There is a law of Congress—

Mr. WASHBURN, of Illinois. What law of Congress?

Mr. LE BLOND. I will say to the gentleman from Illinois that this is a matter relating peculiarly to my own district. In the Thirty-Eighth Congress I introduced a bill (which was passed and became a law) providing for the appraisement of the land for the purpose of extinguishing this title. The appropriation now proposed is in pursuance of that law.

Mr. WASHBURN, of Illinois. My point of order is that this is a proposition to pay a private claim, and cannot be in order on an appropriation bill. I do not now propose, when the House has closed debate, to go into a discussion of the propriety of this large appropriation of $32,000. But it is to provide for no contingency of the Government; it is to carry out no existing law. If this proposition is in order, there is no private claim presented during this session that could not be provided for in an amendment to a general appropriation bill.

The CHAIRMAN. The Chair begs to state to the gentleman from Illinois that he asked the gentleman from Indiana [Mr. NIBLACK] whether this was in pursuance of existing law, and the gentleman replied that it was. On that statement the Chair thinks it is in order.

Mr. WASHBURN, of Illinois. I ask that the law may be produced. That is the ordinary course when a question of this kind is raised. The Chairman of the Committee of the Whole very often suspends his decision until the law is produced. I have no doubt that the gentleman from Indiana thinks that he is correct; but the law ought to be produced, that the Chair as well as members of the House may understand what it is.

Mr. LE BLOND. If the gentleman from Illinois will reflect a moment, he will recollect that when the law upon which this appropriation is based was introduced here as a bill he himself made objection to its passage; but the House passed it almost unanimously.

Mr. WASHBURN, of Illinois. I ask the gentleman to produce the law.

Mr. LE BLOND. It can be produced from the records.

Mr. WASHBURN, of Illinois. When my friend from Indiana spoke to me in regard to this matter this morning I supposed that he was going to bring it up as a private bill. I had no idea he was going to present it as an amendment to a general appropriation bill.

Mr. ELDRIDGE. I rise to a point of order. The question of order raised by the gentleman from Illinois has been decided against him; and now he is arguing it after the decision of the Chair has been given.

The CHAIRMAN. The point of order is well taken. Debate is not in order.

Mr. WASHBURN, of Illinois. The Chair has a right to be properly informed in reference to this question. The Chair admits, unless in pursuance of existing law, this amendment is out of order. I hope that the Chair will require that the law shall be produced. It is incumbent upon the gentleman offering the amendment to produce the law if the question of order is raised.

The CHAIRMAN. If the gentleman from Illinois insists upon that as a point of order, the Chair will suspend his decision until the law is produced.

Mr. WASHBURN, of Illinois. If there is such a law let us see it; but my belief is that there is no such law.

Mr. JOHNSON. There is no question before the House. When two members of this House make the statement that there is such a law, no member has the right to rise up here and say that he believes there is no such law.

Mr. LE BLOND. In the Thirty-Eighth Congress a law was passed to which the section now offered refers. It authorized the Secretary of the Interior to appoint a commission to ascertain the amount and valuation of this land.

Mr. WILSON, of Iowa. I make the point that debate is not in order.

The CHAIRMAN. It seems that the uniform practice has been, when the point of order has been made, to insist on the production of the law; and the Chair will therefore reserve his decision until the law is produced.

Mr. HARDING, of Kentucky. I want the Clerk to read the amendment which was adopted a little while ago on motion of the gentleman from Illinois to amend the act for enrolling and calling out the national forces, and for other purposes.

The amendment was read.

Mr. HARDING, of Kentucky. I now ask the Clerk to read a section of the law which it proposed to amend.

Mr. WASHBURN, of Illinois. Is debate in order?

The CHAIRMAN. It is not.

Mr. HARDING, of Kentucky. I move to strike that amendment out.

The CHAIRMAN. It is not in order as that part of the bill has been passed.

Mr. HARDING, of Kentucky. The amendment is not germane to this bill. That law has vested rights in certain individuals, which it is now unconstitutional to attempt to deprive them of.

Mr. LE BLOND. I have the law here to which I referred, and I ask the Clerk to read it.

The Clerk read as follows:

An act for the relief of William Sawyer and others, of the State of Ohio.

Whereas by the treaty of St. Mary's with the Miami Indians of October 6, 1818, the west half of section No. 26, the east half of section No. 28, and section No. 27, lying in the county of Auglaize and State of Ohio, were reserved and granted to Joseph Richardville, sr., and Joseph Richardville, jr.; and whereas all of said lands have since been sold in several parcels to divers persons by the United States and by the State of Ohio, under and by virtue of a grant from the United States; and whereas by virtue of a judicial sale upon a judgment rendered against the said Joseph Richardville, jr., survivor and sole heir-at-law of the said Joseph Richardville, sr., the title granted to the said Joseph Richardville, sr., and Joseph Richardville, jr., by said treaty in all of said lands has become vested in one Madison Sweetzer, the purchaser at said sale; and whereas the said Madison Sweetzer has established his title to said lands by sundry judgments in ejectment, recovered in the circuit court of the United States for the northern district of Ohio, against the tenants in possession, holding under titles derived, directly or indirectly, from the United States as aforesaid: Therefore,

Be it enacted by the Senate and House of Representatives of the United States of America in Congress assembled, That the Secretary of the Interior be, and he hereby is, authorized and required to cause the unimproved value of the said tracts of land to be ascertained by the valuation and assessment of a commissioner to be appointed by him for that purpose, and which commissioner shall, before he proceeds to the assessment and valuation of the same, take an oath faithfully and impartially to perform his duties as such commissioner. And when the said Secretary of the Interior shall thus ascertain the unimproved value of said lands he shall report the same to the House of Representatives at the earliest practicable moment.

Mr. WASHBURN, of Illinois. What has that to do with this subject?

Mr. LE BLOND. I know the captiousness of the gentleman from Illinois in regard to almost everything.

Mr. WASHBURN, of Illinois. I have done nothing that is captious; I have only done my duty.

Mr. LE BLOND. The gentleman has no right to object when he does not know what he is objecting to. When a man understands that a thing is wrong I recognize his right to object to it. The pending amendment is in pursuance of the law which has been read. The Secretary of the Interior appointed a commissioner who appraised these lands and made a report to Congress, which is upon the table of every member. That report is briefly this, that these parties had a title to these two sections of lands. One of the sections they sold to different individuals; the other was conveyed to the State of Ohio for canal purposes, and was sold by the State to private individuals in my district. The land lies within two miles of the town of St. Mary's, a flourishing place, containing some two thousand inhabitants.

This man Sweetzer had a judgment against Richardville, jr., an Indian, for goods sold. He believed that Richardville was the rightful owner of the land under the treaty of 1818, and thereupon he obtained a judgment against the Indian, levied upon the lands and sold them. Then he filed in the circuit court of the United States his petition against the occupants of the land, claiming that the title of the Indian was paramount. The district court, after hearing the case, decided in favor of Sweetzer. And now it stands in this shape: these occupants, about forty families, are without a title. The title which they derived through the State of Ohio and the United States has been declared void, and the title of Sweetzer, derived through this Indian, has been established as paramount. Now, Sweetzer having a judgment, can at any time oust these occupants by getting out a writ of ejectment. The occupants have applied to the Legislature of the State of Ohio, and have petitioned Congress to quiet their title.

The CHAIRMAN. The Chair is of opinion that this debate is not in order, and that the section is not properly introduced as an amendment. The original law makes no appropriation to carry it out.

Mr. STEVENS. I move that the committee rise and report the bill to the House.

The motion was agreed to.

So the committee rose; and the Speaker having resumed the chair, Mr. RAYMOND reported that the Committee of the Whole on the state of the Union, according to order, had had under consideration the bill of the House (No. 737) making appropriations for sundry civil expenses of the Government for the year ending June 30, 1867, and for other purposes, had made sundry amendments thereto, and directed him to report the same to the House with a recommendation that the bill do pass.

Mr. STEVENS. I move to amend the bill by inserting section two, which was stricken out in Committee of the Whole, and I demand the previous question on the bill and amendments.

The amendment was read, as follows:

SEC. 2. And be it further enacted, That the following sums be, and the same are hereby, appropriated, out of any money in the Treasury not otherwise appropriated, for the objects hereinafter expressed, namely:

Office of United States depository, Louisville:
For salary of cashier, $1,800.
For salary of book-keeper, $1,500.
For salary of assistant cashier, $1,320.
For salary of clerk, $1,320.

For salary of book-keeper, $1,500.
For salary of two clerks, $2,500.
For salary of clerk, $1,200.
For contingent expenses, $2,000.

Mr. WASHBURNE, of Illinois. I desire to offer an amendment.

Mr. STEVENS. I decline to yield.

Mr. HARDING, of Kentucky. I appeal to the gentleman's generosity.

Mr. STEVENS. I have no generosity. [Laughter.]

On seconding the demand for the previous question there were—ayes 47, noes 46.

Mr. WRIGHT. I demand tellers.

Tellers were refused.

So the previous question was seconded.

On ordering the main question there were—ayes 63, noes 36.

Mr. LAWRENCE, of Ohio. I call for the yeas and nays on ordering the main question.

The yeas and nays were refused.

So the main question was ordered.

Mr. WASHBURNE, of Illinois. I ask for a separate vote on the amendments.

Mr. HARDING, of Kentucky. I ask for a separate vote on the amendment of the gentleman from Illinois [Mr. WASHBURNE] repealing a section of another law, which was not understood by anybody.

The SPEAKER. If there is no objection the amendment offered by the gentleman from Pennsylvania [Mr. STEVENS] will be reserved until the others are acted upon.

The question being taken on agreeing to the rest of the amendments reported from the Committee of the Whole, they were agreed to.

The question recurred on the amendment reserved on motion of Mr. HARDING, of Kentucky, namely, to add to section three the following:

And the twenty-fourth section of the act entitled "An act to amend an act entitled 'An act for enrolling and calling out the national forces, and for other purposes,' approved March 3, 1853," and approved July 24, 1864, be, and the same is hereby, repealed.

Mr. HARDING, of Kentucky. I ask to have the twenty-fourth section, which that amendment proposes to repeal, read.

Mr. ROLLINS. I object.

Mr. HARDING, of Kentucky. I appeal to the gentleman to withdraw his objection. I simply want the law read that you propose to repeal.

The SPEAKER. Debate is not in order.

Mr. HARDING, of Kentucky. I rise to a question of order. Is it in order in a mere appropriation bill to repeal an existing law that vests title without having that law read?

The SPEAKER. It is too late; the bill is reported from the Committee of the Whole.

Mr. HARDING, of Kentucky. Another point of order. I was sitting here all the time and the noise was such that I did not hear it, and I was not aware of the amendment being made until the gentleman told me. That was the first information I had.

Mr. ROLLINS. I withdraw my objection.

Mr. BINGHAM. I renew it. Every member of the House is supposed to understand what the law is.

Mr. HARDING, of Kentucky. I demand the yeas and nays on the amendment.

The yeas and nays were ordered.

Mr. TRIMBLE. I rise to a point of order. I think I have a right to know, before I vote on this question, what law is repealed.

The SPEAKER. The Chair overrules the point of order on the ground that every member of Congress is presumed to know every law that has been passed.

Mr. TRIMBLE. That is a very violent presumption. [Laughter.]

The question being taken on agreeing to the amendment, it was decided in the affirmative—years 83, nays 38, not voting 61; as follows:

YEAS—Messrs. Alley, Allison, Ames, Anderson, Delos R. Ashley, James M. Ashley, Baker, Barker, Baxter, Bidwell, Bingham, Bromwell, Bundy, Reader W. Clarke, Sidney Clarke, Cobb, Conkling, Cook, Dawes, DeForest, Deming, Donnelly, Driggs, Eggleston, Eliot, Ferry, Garfield, Grinnell, Abner C. Harding, Hart, Henderson, Higby, Holmes, Asahel W. Hubbard, John H. Hubbard, James R. Hubbell, Hubbard, Ingersoll, Jencks, Julian, Kasson, Kelso, Ketchum, Laffin, William Lawrence, Longyear, Marston, Marvin, McClurg, McKee, McKuer, Mercur, Miller, Moorhead, Morrill, Morris, Moulton, Myers, Newell, O'Neill, Paine, Perham, Pike, Price, Alexander H. Rice, John H. Rice, Rollins, Sawyer, Scofield, Spalding, Stevens, Thayer, Trowbridge, Van Aernam, Burt Van Horn, Robert T. Van Horn, Ward, Warner, Elihu B. Washburne, Henry D. Washburn, Welker, James E. Wilson, and Windom—83.

NAYS—Messrs. Ancona, Benjamin, Bergen, Boyer, Coffroth, Eldridge, Finck, Glossbrenner, Grider, Hale, Aaron Harding, Harris, Hogan, Chester D. Hubbard, Humphrey, Johnson, Latham, Le Blond, Marshall, Niblack, Nicholson, Noell, Phelps, Samuel J. Randall, William H. Randall, Ritter, Rogers, Ross, Rousseau, Shanklin, Strouse, Taber, Taylor, Thornton, Trimble, Whaley, Williams, and Wright—38.

NOT VOTING—Messrs. Baldwin, Banks, Beaman, Blaine, Blow, Boutwell, Brandegee, Broomall, Buckland, Chanler, Culom, Culver, Darling, Davis, Dawson, Delano, Denison, Dixon, Dodge, Dumont, Eckley, Farnsworth, Farguhar, Goodyear, Griswold, Hayes, Hill, Hooper, Hotchkiss, Demas Hubbard, Edwin N. Hubbell, Jones, Kelley, Kerr, Kuykendall, George V. Lawrence, Loan, Lynch, McCullough, Melndoe, Orth, Patterson, Plants, Pomeroy, Radiator, Raymond, Schenck, Shellabarger, Sitgreaves, Sloan, Smith, Starr, Stillwell, Francis Thomas, John L. Thomas, Upson, William B. Washburn, Wentworth, Stephen E. Wilson, Winfield, and Woodbridge—61.

So the amendment was agreed to.

During the roll-call,

Mr. WASHBURNE, of Indiana, stated that his colleague, Mr. ORTH, was confined to his room by sickness.

The result having been announced as above recorded,

The question recurred on the amendment of Mr. STEVENS to reinsert the second section of the bill; and there were—ayes 35, noes 30; no quorum voting.

Mr. WASHBURNE, of Illinois, demanded the yeas and nays.

The yeas and nays were refused.

Mr. WASHBURNE, of Illinois, demanded tellers on the yeas and nays.

Tellers were refused.

Tellers were then ordered on agreeing to the amendment; and the Chair appointed Mr. WASHBURNE, of Illinois, and Mr. STEVENS.

The House divided; and the tellers reported—ayes 60, noes 37.

So the amendment was agreed to.

The bill was then ordered to be engrossed and read a third time; and being engrossed, it was accordingly read the third time.

Mr. STEVENS. I demand the previous question on the passage.

The previous question was seconded and the main question ordered.

Mr. HARDING, of Kentucky. I demand the yeas and nays on the passage.

The yeas and nays were refused.

Mr. HARDING, of Kentucky. I demand tellers on the yeas and nays.

Tellers were refused.

The bill was then passed.

Mr. STEVENS moved to reconsider the vote by which the bill was passed; and also moved to lay the motion to reconsider on the table.

The latter motion was agreed to.

Mr. ANCONA. I demand the regular order.

ELECTION CONTEST—FULLER VERSUS DAWSON.

The House resumed the consideration of the regular order of business, being the consideration of the report of the Committee of Elections in the case of Fuller vs. Dawson, from the twenty-first congressional district of Pennsylvania, on which Mr. PAINE was entitled to the floor.

Mr. PAINE addressed the House. [His remarks will be found in the Appendix.]

The resolution reported by the Committee of Elections was as follows:

Resolved, That Hon. John L. Dawson is entitled to retain his seat as Representative in the Thirty-Ninth Congress from the twenty-first district of the State of Pennsylvania.

The pending question was upon the motion of Mr. SCOFIELD to amend by striking out all after the word "resolved" and inserting in lieu thereof the following:

That Hon. John L. Dawson is not entitled to retain his seat as Representative in the Thirty-Ninth Congress from the twenty-first district of the State of Pennsylvania.

Resolved, That Smith Fuller is entitled to a seat as a Representative in the Thirty-Ninth Congress from the twenty-first district of Pennsylvania.

Mr. SCOFIELD. I call for the yeas and nays on the amendment.

The question was taken upon ordering the yeas and nays; and upon a division there were—ayes 13, noes 95; not one fifth in the affirmative.

Before the result of the vote was announced, Mr. HOTCHKISS called for tellers on ordering the yeas and nays.

The question was taken; and there were, upon a division—ayes thirteen, not one fifth of a quorum.

So tellers were refused, and the yeas and nays were refused.

The amendment was then disagreed to.

The question recurred upon the resolution reported by the committee.

Mr. SCOFIELD. I call for the yeas and nays on agreeing to the resolution.

The question was taken upon ordering the yeas and nays; and upon a division, there were—ayes 16, noes 100.

So (one fifth not voting in the affirmative) the yeas and nays were not ordered.

The resolution of the committee was then agreed to.

Mr. PAINE moved to reconsider the vote by which the resolution was agreed to; and also moved that the motion to reconsider be laid on the table.

The latter motion was agreed to.

Mr. PAINE, from the Committee of Elections, reported the following resolution; which was read, considered, and agreed to:

Resolved, That there be paid to Smith Fuller, out of the contingent fund of the House, the sum of $2,500 in full for time spent and expenses incurred in contesting the right of Hon. John L. Dawson to a seat in this House as a Representative from the twenty-first congressional district of Pennsylvania.

Mr. DAWES moved to reconsider the vote by which the resolution was agreed to; and also moved to lay the motion to reconsider on the table.

The latter motion was agreed to.

PREVENTION OF SMUGGLING.

Mr. ELIOT submitted the following report:

The committee of conference on the disagreeing votes of the two Houses on the bill (S. No. 222) entitled "An act further to prevent smuggling, and for other purposes," having met, after full and free conference they have agreed to recommend, and do recommend, to their respective Houses as follows:

That the Senate agree to the first, second, third, fourth, sixth, seventh, eighth, ninth, tenth, eleventh, twelfth, thirteenth, fourteenth, and fifteenth amendments as the same were made by the House of Representatives.

That the Senate agree to the fifth amendment of the House of Representatives to the bill, with the following amendment, to wit: insert in place of the words stricken out by the House of Representatives the words following: "In all cases where the possession of such goods shall be shown to be in the defendant, or where the defendant shall be shown to have had possession thereof, such possession shall be deemed evidence sufficient to authorize conviction, unless the defendant shall explain the possession to the satisfaction of the jury."

That the House of Representatives agree to the said amendment to the bill.

JOHN CONNESS,
L. M. MORRILL,
Managers on the part of the Senate.
THOMAS D. ELIOT,
JOHN L. THOMAS,
Managers on the part of the House.

The report of the committee of conference was agreed to.

Mr. ELIOT moved to reconsider the vote by which the report was agreed to; and also moved that the motion to reconsider be laid on the table.

The latter motion was agreed to.

OFFICERS OF THE ARMY.

Mr. BINGHAM. I ask unanimous consent to take from the Speaker's table Senate amendments to the joint resolution (H. R. No. 101) for the relief of certain officers of the Army.

Mr. HARDING, of Kentucky. I object.

ASSAULT UPON A MEMBER.

Mr. SPALDING. I rise to a question of privilege, and call up the resolutions of the select committee relative to the assault upon the gentleman from Iowa, [Mr. GRINNELL.]

Mr. ALLEY. If the gentleman from Ohio [Mr. SPALDING] will yield to me, I will move to adjourn.

Mr. SPALDING. I yield for that purpose.

Mr. ALLEY. I move that the House adjourn.

The motion was agreed to; and thereupon (at five o'clock p. m.) the House adjourned.

PETITIONS, ETC.

The following petitions, &c., were presented under the rule and referred to the appropriate committees: By Mr. KASSON: The petition of E. W. Fullerton, and others, for the passage of the bill (H. R. No. 304) granting aid to State Line railroad in Iowa.

By Mr. LONGYEAR: The memorial of John D. Parkhurst, late captain company A, eighth United States Veteran volunteers, asking relief touching certain money paid him by the United States through the Merchants' National Bank, of Washington, District of Columbia, and lost by the failure of said bank.

By Mr. SCHENCK: The petition of Private Edward Quinn, an old soldier of ordnance battalion, United States Army, praying to be relieved from the effect of loss of time between enlistments.

Also, the memorial of A. Giesou, and five others, of New York, officers of United States volunteers, who were promoted from the ranks after the 3d of March, 1865, praying that the law may be so amended as to extend to them the benefit of the three months' extra pay.

IN SENATE.

SATURDAY, July 14, 1866.

Prayer by Rev. T. G. FREEMAN, of New York.

On motion of Mr. WILSON, and by unanimous consent, the reading of the Journal of yesterday was dispensed with.

PETITION.

Mr. GUTHRIE presented a memorial of the board of directors of the Louisville and Portland canal, praying for a loan of $1,000,000 in Government bonds, secured by a second mortgage on the canal and enlargements, to enable the company to complete the work; which was referred to the Committee on Finance.

REPORTS OF COMMITTEES.

Mr. POLAND. I am instructed by a majority of the Committee on Public Buildings and Grounds, to whom was referred the petition of Henry S. Davis, to report a bill (S. No. 427) for the relief of Henry S. Davis, accompanied by a report, which I ask to have printed.

The bill was read a first time by its title and passed to a second reading, and the report was ordered to be printed.

Mr. POLAND. I am instructed by the chairman of the committee to say that he designs to submit a minority report, which he wishes to have printed with the bill reported by the majority of the committee.

BILL INTRODUCED.

Mr. JOHNSON asked, and by unanimous consent obtained, leave to introduce a bill (S. No. 428) for the relief of the sufferers by the late fire at Portland, Maine; which was read twice by its title, laid on the table, and ordered to be printed.

COLORED SOLDIERS' BOUNTIES.

Mr. WILSON. I move to take up the joint resolution (H. R. No. 176) amendatory of a joint resolution entitled "A resolution respecting bounties to colored soldiers, and the pensions, bounties, and allowances to their heirs," approved June 15, 1866, for the purpose of recommitting it.

The motion was agreed to.

Mr. WILSON. I now move that the resolution be recommitment to the Committee on Military Affairs and the Militia.

The motion was agreed to.

EQUALIZATION OF BOUNTIES.

Mr. WILSON. I move to take up the House bill to equalize bounties with the view to have it specially assigned for Tuesday next.

The motion to take up the bill (H. R. No. 602) to equalize the bounties of soldiers, sailors, and marines who served in the late war for the Union, was agreed to.

Mr. WILSON. I now move that the bill be postponed until Tuesday next, and be made the special order for that day at one o'clock.

The motion was agreed to.

JOINT COMMITTEE ON RETRENCHMENT.

Mr. EDMUNDS. I move that the Senate proceed to the consideration of the House concurrent resolution providing for the appointment of a joint committee on the subject of retrenchment.

The motion was agreed to; and the Senate proceeded to consider the following resolution, which was received from the House of Representatives on the 2d of July:

Whereas the financial condition of the United States demands the exercise of a rigid economy in all departments of the Government, in order to sustain the credit of the nation, and to relieve the people at the earliest possible day from the burden of excessive taxation; and whereas there is reason to believe that in many departments of the civil service abuses have for a long time existed, and still exist, in the perpetuation of useless offices and sinecures, in extravagant salaries and allowances, and in other unnecessary and wasteful expenditures: Therefore, Resolved by the House of Representatives, (the Senate concurring.) That a joint select committee be appointed, to consist of two members of the Senate and three members of the House, to be styled "the joint select committee on retrenchment;" that said committee be instructed to inquire into the expenditures in all the branches of the civil service of the United States, and to report whether any, and what, offices ought to be abolished; whether any, and what, salaries or allowances ought to be reduced; and generally how, and to what extent, the expenses of the civil service of the country may and ought to be curtailed. That said committee be authorized to sit during the recess of Congress, to send for persons and papers, and to report by bill or otherwise; and that said committee may appoint a clerk for the term of six months, and no more.

Mr. SHERMAN. I move to amend the resolution by striking out the word "civil" before "service" wherever it occurs, so that it may apply to all services.

The amendment was agreed to.

Mr. EDMUNDS. I move to amend the resolution by inserting after the word "reduced," in the seventh line the words, "what are the methods of securing accountability in public officers or agents in the care and disbursement of public moneys, whether moneys have been paid out illegally, and whether any officers or agents or other persons have been or are engaged in the service without authority of law or unnecessarily."

The amendment was agreed to.

Mr. ANTHONY. I have an amendment, which I offer at the suggestion of the Senator from Missouri, [Mr. BROWN,] who requests me to offer it in his absence. I heartily concur in it. It is to insert after the word "curtailed," in the ninth line of the resolution, the following:

And also to consider the expediency of so amending the laws under which appointments to the civil service are now made as to provide for the selection of subordinate officers after due examination by proper boards, their continuance in office during specified terms, unless dismissed upon charges preferred and sustained before tribunals designated for that purpose, and for withdrawing the civil service from being used as an instrument of political or party patronage.

Mr. EDMUNDS. I certainly entirely agree to the propriety of what is contained in that amendment; but it appears to me, and has appeared to other gentlemen with whom I have consulted upon the subject of the amendment of the Senator from Rhode Island, for it has been talked about, that if this committee properly perform the duty which the resolution already provides for, it will have sufficient labor on its hands from now till the 1st of December, during all the time it would be willing to work. By providing for too many subjects of inquiry we are, I fear, likely not to accomplish anything. I would prefer, therefore, that this amendment should not be adopted to this resolution; but I should most heartily go for it as an independent proposition committed to some other committee, so as to be sure to have the service performed; for it is very important, certainly sufficiently important, to engage the attention of a special committee on that subject alone.

Mr. ANTHONY. I think that the committee cannot well examine the subject that is already committed to them by the resolution without taking into consideration the subject of the amendment of the Senator from Missouri. I think that in examining the first question they will be necessarily obliged to examine the second. If it should be found that they have not time to examine the whole, they might make a supplementary report; but it is better, I think, that the whole subject should be referred to one committee rather than to two.

Mr. EDMUNDS. There is great force in what my friend from Rhode Island says, and I shall not oppose the adoption of this amendment; but if it be adopted I shall propose an increase of the number of the committee, so that the work may be subdivided and the thing accomplished in that way.

Mr. ANTHONY. I will strike out the word "civil" before "service," to make it correspond with the amendment of the Senator from Ohio.

Mr. SHERMAN. Oh no; that should not be done, because officers in the military and naval service cannot now be dismissed except on the finding of a court-martial. They come within the rule proposed, so that this amendment should be confined to the civil service.

Mr. ANTHONY. Very well.

The amendment was agreed to.

Mr. EDMUNDS. I move now to amend the resolution by striking out the word "two," in the second line, and inserting the word "three;" and by striking out the word "three," in the third line, and inserting the word "five;" so that the committee will consist of three members of the Senate, and five members of the House of Representatives.

The amendment was agreed to.

Mr. JOHNSON. I ask for the reading of the resolution as amended.

The Secretary read it, as follows:

Whereas the financial condition of the United States demands the exercise of a rigid economy in all departments of the Government in order to sustain the credit of the nation and to relieve the people at the earliest possible day from the burden of excessive taxation; and whereas there is reason to believe that in many departments of the service abuses have for a long time existed, and still exist, in the perpetuation of useless offices and sinecures, in extravagant salaries and allowances, and in other unnecessary and wasteful expenditures: Therefore,

Resolved by the House of Representatives, (the Senate concurring.) That a joint select committee be appointed, to consist of three members of the Senate and five members of the House, to be styled "the joint select committee on retrenchment;" that said committee be instructed to inquire into the expenditures in all the branches of the service of the United States, and to report whether any, and what, offices ought to be abolished; whether any, and what, salaries or allowances ought to be reduced; what are the methods of securing accountability in public officers or agents in the care and disbursement of public moneys; whether moneys have been paid out illegally; and whether any officers or agents or other persons have been, or are, engaged in the service without authority of law or unnecessarily; and generally, how and to what extent the expenses of the service of the country may and ought to be curtailed; and also to consider the expediency of so amending the laws under which appointments to the civil service are now made as to provide for the selection of subordinate officers after due examination by proper boards; their continuance in office during specified times unless dismissed upon charges preferred and sustained before tribunals designated for that purpose; and for withdrawing the civil service from being used as an instrument of political or party patronage; that said committee be authorized to sit during the recess of Congress, to send for persons and papers, and to report by bill or otherwise; and that said committee may appoint a clerk for the term of six months, and no more.

Mr. JOHNSON. The resolution is so framed, I suppose, that it is not to be submitted to the President. I think the language is:

"Resolved by the House of Representatives, (the Senate concurring.)"

I ask my friend from Vermont whether he supposes that that resolution is to be sent to the President in the ordinary way.

Mr. EDMUNDS. The honorable member from Maryland is much better versed in constitutional law than I am; but if he wishes my opinion, I will state it frankly, that I do not think a resolution of this description requires to be sent to the President of the United States for his approval; that it is a species of inquiry which Congress, as the grand inquest of the nation, as it is sometimes called, may, just as well out of session as in session, by its committees enter into if there be sufficient occasion for it.

Mr. JOHNSON. My honorable friend misunderstood me. I was not saying it was not in the power of Congress to institute an inquiry of this sort without the sanction of the President. I merely asked whether the resolution was intended to be a resolution of that description.

Mr. EDMUNDS. It is intended to be a resolution of inquiry and investigation of the two Houses.

Mr. JOHNSON. Merely?

Mr. EDMUNDS. Merely.

The resolution, as amended, was adopted.

UNIFORM BANKRUPT LAW.

Mr. POLAND. I move to take up the bill to establish a uniform system of bankruptcy. I do not ask to have it taken up for consideration now, but merely to fix a time for its consideration. I trust that it will be assented to and taken up for that purpose merely.

The motion was agreed to; and the bill (H. R. No. 598) to establish a uniform system of bankruptcy throughout the United States was taken up.

Mr. POLAND. I move that the bill be made the special order for next Monday at one o'clock.

The motion was agreed to.

MESSAGE FROM THE HOUSE.

A message from the House of Representatives, by Mr. McPHERSON, its Clerk, announced that the House had concurred in the report of the committee of conference on the bill (S. No. 222) further to prevent smuggling, and for other purposes.

CIVIL APPROPRIATION BILL.

The message also announced that the House had passed a bill (H. R. No. 737) making appropriations for sundry civil expenses of the Government for the year ending June 30, 1867; and on motion of Mr. FESSENDEN it was read twice by its title and referred to the Committee on Finance.

LEASING OF MINERAL SPRINGS.

Mr. HARRIS. I move that the Senate proceed to the consideration of Senate bill No. 351.

The motion was agreed to; and the Senate, as in Committee of the Whole, resumed the consideration of the bill (S. No. 351) to authorize the Secretary of the Interior to lease such of the public lands of the United States as are known as saline lands or lands containing mineral springs, and to provide for the preservation and development of the same.

The bill was reported to the Senate as amended.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The question is on concurring in the amendment made as in Committee of the Whole.

Mr. GRIMES. I call for the reading of the bill.

The Secretary read the bill as amended, as follows:

Be it enacted, &c., That authority is hereby given to the Secretary of the Interior to lease to responsible parties such saline land or lands containing mineral springs, situated east of the one hundred and second meridian of longitude, as in his judgment may be leased with advantage to the Government and the public: Provided, That no such lease shall be for a longer period than twenty-five years, subject to readjustment every five years by disinterested referees, nor at a rate of rental less than the revenue assessed from time to time on manufactured salt or income tax upon mineral springs by act of Congress.

Sec. 2. And be it further enacted, That the Secretary of the Interior shall prescribe all necessary rules and regulations for the leasing, preserving, and developing said saline lands and mineral springs, and for the securing and collection of the revenues due to the Government therefrom: Provided, That such rules and regulations may be subject to revision by Congress.

Mr. CONNESS. I should like to inquire of the honorable Senator who has charge of this bill what is meant by the words on the last line of the first page, "income tax upon mineral springs by act of Congress." What is the present "tax on mineral springs by act of Congress?"

Mr. HARRIS. I am not able to state what the income tax charged on mineral springs by act of Congress is.

Mr. CONNESS. My impression is that there is no such tax.

Mr. POMEROY. Mineral waters are taxed so much per bottle. I understand that when they are put up in bottles and made merchandise of they are taxed.

Mr. CONNESS. When this bill was called up the other day I submitted a few remarks in opposition to it. I regard it as one of the most mischievous acts that could possibly be put upon our statutes. I say so with great respect to the honorable Senator who has it in charge and to the committee who have reported it. It is the introduction of a policy that in my opinion never ought to prevail in this Republic. It is founded, in the first place, upon the monarchical idea and policy that all that is valuable in lands, particularly in the way of minerals, either the precious metals or otherwise, belongs to the sovereign and not to the subject. In other words, that whatever is valuable should be taxed as high as possible to the subject. Our system is not the one to attach, particularly by statutory enactment, this principle to, in my judgment. I do not know anything that is of sufficient value, either above the earth or in the earth or under the earth, not to be worthy of possession by an American citizen. With us we not only own the land but we own the Government, too. We own the sovereignty; the sovereignty does not own us; we are the sovereigns in the aggregate; and so we propose to provide for leasing to ourselves a thing because it has value. Why should not the ownership of that thing pass into the hands of the citizen? Is there anybody in the world, is there any power on earth which can find the value or develop the value of a thing faster and more certainly than its owner, and can there be any ownership of a higher character than that of the American citizen?

The whole system seems to me to be wrong. You are going to institute in one of your Departments a power to lease and let a part of the public property to your own citizens, and no such lease, the bill provides, shall be for a longer period than twenty-five years, and then during the twenty-five years the lease is to be subject to readjustment every five years, by "disinterested referees." The Interior Department or the Land Office is to appoint referees every five years. Where shall they go? Shall they act in regard to a piece of property that they know nothing about except as they get information from the Land Office, that information coming through a bureau that perhaps knows nothing whatever about it? The readjustment is to determine the rental to be charged.

It appears to me to be a very small business for this Government to engage in. It is especially provided, it will be observed, that this bill shall not apply to the section of the country from which I come. We are not to be made tenants, and, for one, I am very much obliged to the committee for releasing us from such a vassalage; but why shall we be released from this vassalage and the people east of the Rocky mountains subjected to it? I do not understand it.

As I said, when up the other day, this is one of a class of measures originating in the Land Office, in my opinion not creditable to the Land Office, not founded in good policy, not consistent with our system or scheme of government.

Sir, it is hard to be called upon to discuss a measure of this kind when the thermometer stands as high as it does this morning in the Senate Chamber; but I feel as though my duty would be ill performed if such a measure should be allowed to pass without calling public attention to it. If the saline lands and the mineral springs belonging to the Government are to be leased, why not lease the gold and silver mines? They are of infinitely greater value; they attract the attention of mankind to a greater extent and concentrate the effort of man and the capital that man can bring to the development of natural resources to a greater extent than these more ordinary classes of property. But it is not in our time proposed to make tenants of the people who mine for gold or silver or copper or lead or iron or coal. There is indeed upon our statutes an act passed recently which proposes to sell coal lands, or lands suspected of containing coal, at a very high rate—a rate that they are not worth; and the way it acts is that it prevents operations in coal mining. No man can mine upon coal lands, or lands suspected to contain coal, upon the public domain, without paying twenty dollars per acre for the land, while he may go into Pennsylvania, into Illinois, into New Jersey, and other States of the Union and buy the best coal lands for from $2 50 to five dollars an acre, containing real coal mines of valuable coal. There is no act now that calls so much for repeal as the so-called coal-land act. Occasionally we see a little paragraph in the papers stating that the Treasury has received a certain amount of money from the sale of coal lands. It is an absolute robbery in every case. That is what it is. We by statute propose that certain persons who fancy there is coal in a particular place shall not try to obtain it until they have paid an amount for the land which it is in no manner worth.

The second section of this bill provides that "the Secretary of the Interior shall prescribe all necessary rules and regulations for the leasing, preserving, and developing said saline lands and mineral springs, and for the securing and collection of the rental revenues due the Government therefrom; provided, that such rules and regulations may be subject to revision by Congress."

You are to have a code of rules adopted in the Interior Department, and Congress is to have the privilege of revising them; and those rules are for the leasing and the preserving of mineral springs. I suppose the rules will be in the nature of ordinances which shall inflict fines and punishment if anybody fills a bottle of mineral water from mineral springs without paying the United States for it, without getting a permit from the Secretary of the Interior.

Now, Mr. President, if any Senator who can advocate this measure will give us facts, state to us the extent of this property, and what the United States is going to gain by instituting this system, I should like very much to hear it. If the Land Office is able to state it, I should like very much to hear it.

I am very certain that this bill had its origination in some cases that came up in my State, where citizens of ours have expended as high as $150,000 of their property and means in developing mineral springs. There is nothing in the value of a mineral spring that should induce the Government to become its peculiar custodian. It is proposed now to make such a man—but we are exempted from the operations of this act; but if there be a like case on this side of the mountains it is proposed to make such a man a tenant.

But, Mr. President, I have said enough at present to call the attention of the Senate to the bill. I regret very much that the honorable Senator from New York, so enlightened, so liberal, and so generous upon all subjects, should undertake the advocacy of this bill.

Mr. HARRIS. Mr. President, since this bill was before the Senate the other day, I have taken occasion to consult with the Secretary of the Interior in relation to it. The bill originated with that officer, and not in the Land Office, as has been stated by the Senator from California. The Secretary informed me that there are in various places on the public lands salt springs. He pointed out on the map to me some very rich and valuable springs in Nebraska, others in the southwest part of Kansas. He informed me that he had repeated applications for the leasing of those salt springs. They are reserved from sale and are situated on the public lands. They are now unproductive, lying idle. Individuals are willing to take those springs upon leases, to improve, to erect the necessary structures for manufacturing salt, to construct the roads necessary to bring out the salt, and thus create a manufacture which will be valuable to the inhabitants of that section of the country.

He further stated what would not be pertinent to this bill, for the Committee on Public Lands, out of regard to the Senators from the Pacific coast—who are exceedingly sensitive whenever the hand of the Government is laid upon them—out of regard to their sensitiveness rather than from any conviction of their judgment, the committee have not made this bill operative upon the Pacific coast; and yet the Secretary informed me that there was an island in the bay of San Francisco for which he had been repeatedly offered a rent of $2,000, an island reserved, which cannot be sold; and lying a little outside there is another cluster of islands for which he has been offered a rent of $3,000—two items which would pretty nearly pay for the valuable services of the Senator from California, if we were allowed to let them.

Under these circumstances, I cannot see why the Government should not do as we as individuals would do, try to get a little revenue from this idle property. It seems to me we ought to do it; and I cannot see any possible objection to it. Why should we not allow these springs to be let to individuals who will go on and improve them, and thus perhaps derive many thousand dollars of revenue? We need it all. Why not allow it to be done? I can hardly account for the sensitiveness of the Senators from the Pacific coast on this subject.

Mr. CONNESS. I should like to inquire of the Senator whether he can tell us how and why saline lands or salt lands and mineral springs are reserved from sale, under what law.

Mr. HARRIS. I cannot point out the law, but I am sure there is one; and it has been the policy of the Government never to sell them. They have never been sold.

Mr. POMEROY. When a State is admitted into the Union it is allowed twelve—at least Kansas was—and the Government reserves the remainder. We cannot buy a salt spring in my State.

Mr. HARRIS. As I understand it, each new State, on its admission, is allowed to receive some six springs, or some number of springs—

Mr. POMEROY. From six to twelve.

Mr. HARRIS. And the rest is reserved to the General Government.

Mr. CONNESS. The honorable Senator, when up, touched a point of this subject which throws a flood of light upon it. He says that this bill originated in applications made to the Interior Department for leases for such property, and that the Secretary of the Interior has had applications offering two or three thousand dollars per annum for islands in the bay of San Francisco and outside of the bay. Now, this explains the whole matter. Our people—I do not mean now the people of California, but the people of the United States—go and take possession of a soda or sulphur spring; they bottle the waters and send them into the market; they erect such works and improvements as are necessary to carry on that business; and then their envious and jealous neighbors, knowing that the title in fee has not passed to those persons, desire to get the legal possession from the United States, and thus make these forms of application.

That is the origination of this bill. Applications have been made, we are told, to the Secretary of the Interior for islands in the bay of San Francisco. What islands? There are only a few islands there. There are only three islands in that bay, namely Alcatraz, Angel Island, and Yerba Buena or Goat Island. They are all three Government reserves for military purposes. The Government has taken complete and entire possession of two of them, and nobody is permitted to go upon them except by leave of the Government. I do not know whether the Government has taken complete possession of the other, but there are parties living upon it who, however, have no title, the title being in the Government of the United States, and they are set apart by the President as part of the Government reserves for war or defensive purposes. It seems that parties apply for those islands. Why? Because they contain valuable quarries of stone which, in one case, the Government is now using. Parties, of course, would give $2,000 for one of those large islands. Our troops occupying the harbor of San Francisco are stationed on those islands. They have farms and gardens for the support of the posts upon them.

Mr. HARRIS. Those are not the islands to which the Secretary of the Interior referred.

Mr. CONNESS. Certainly they are, for there are no other islands in the bay. The Secretary of the Interior refers also to the islands known as the Farallones, which are outside of the harbor. Those islands are held by certain parties who claimed them at a very early day, and they are very valuable because they are inhabited by vast flocks of wild ducks and other birds. They deposit their eggs upon the islands, and they are taken to market by persons who have had quiet possession of those islands since that country was settled. There have been a great many quarrels in regard to the possession of those islands, and parties who have failed to get legitimate possession now seek to get possession from the Government, and make applications for that purpose. The whole business seems to me to be utterly out of our sphere and improper to be done.

Mr. POMEROY. I do not like to occupy any time in regard to this bill; I will only say that it is entirely different from the bills which the Committee on Public Lands have usually reported. We have been charged almost every day with trying to get some lands from the Government that belong to the Government, and we thought we would see if we could get some revenue to the Government from the public lands. Under the tax bill of last year we taxed mineral water about two cents a bottle. It was thought to be, and it was, quite a source of revenue. This year it is put on the free list. I believe in the new tax bill mineral water does not pay anything, so that the provision the Senator from California spoke of may as well be stricken out, because the present law does not require any tax on mineral water.

Mr. CONNESS. You had better strike it all out.

Mr. POMEROY. But I have this to add: it is as legitimate a source of revenue to the Government as any other source that the Government can apply to. The Senator from California says there is nothing too good for the American people; they own the whole country, Government and all. That is pretty nearly true; but while there is not anything too good for the American people that the Government owns, yet the Government is not in the habit of giving to the American people everything they have without some consideration. I do not know what right the Government, or Congress, which administers the affairs of the Government, has to give away valuable things without some consideration. If we were out of debt, and did not owe anything, and did not need to collect any revenue, we could afford to be very generous and give to individuals what belongs to the public; but I do not believe that that is right under the present condition of affairs. I believe the Government, and not individuals, ought to acquire what benefits can be derived from these springs; and whatever lease can be put upon these mineral springs that will produce money to the Government is a legitimate source of revenue. The Committee on Public Lands have not reported bills of this character heretofore, but we thought, as we were trying to get revenue out of everything, that this was a legitimate source of revenue. At any rate, it was recommended by the Secretary of the Interior, and we reported the bill. If the Senate do not want to pass it, they can kill the bill. We thought the Government would realize something out of it; but if the Senate think otherwise, let them defeat the bill.

Mr. GRIMES. If this bill emanated from the Secretary of the Interior it certainly came from a source that entitles it to the utmost consideration; but I trust that the Senate will not proceed to pass it until they have maturely deliberated upon the effect that it is likely to have and the new principle that is involved in it. I suppose the Senator from New York will agree with me that up to this time the Government never has embarked in this business of becoming a landlord, and having a portion of the people of the country become its tenants. I wish it to be understood, too, that this bill does not apply to the Pacific coast. The Senator from California says that it was doubtless intended to apply there, and as it was introduced it did apply there; but the Senator from New York, who has charge of the bill, has consented to an amendment by which its provisions shall only apply to that portion of the United States that is east of the one hundredth meridian.

Mr. POMEROY. I can explain that, if the Senator desires it, in one moment.

Mr. GRIMES. I suppose I understand it. I suppose I understand the whole of this bill. They intend that it shall apply to a few salt springs in Kansas and a few in the Territory of Nebraska. A gentleman, who may be in the galleries now, has been to see me within the last three or four days, and he told me that he had already perfected an arrangement by which he was to secure a lease on one or more of these salt springs.

Now, Mr. President, I have to say, in the first place, that this is the inauguration of a new principle. This Government never has and it never ought to become the landlord of a portion of the people of this country. That is not the relation that is encouraged by any of the laws of our States to any considerable extent, and it ought not to be encouraged by the Government of the United States. The true principle, I understand, in a republican Government is, that so far as possible every man shall be the owner of his own soil; the owner of his own tools, the owner of his own labor, and his own machinery.

The Senator from Kansas says that the Government ought not to give the salt springs away. I agree with him in that. He thinks that they ought not to sell and part with their title at $1 25 an acre. I agree with him in that. The Government ought to realize as much as it is possible to realize from these salt springs. In order that there may be the proper sort of rivalry among persons who wish to embark their money in salt-boiling or salt-evaporation in any manner, let bids be issued; let the Senator from Kansas and his neighbors have an opportunity to send in their propositions to the Secretary of the Interior or to the Commissioner of the General Land Office, stating what they will give for a given tract of land upon which they believe there is a salt spring of some value, and let the Secretary of the Interior sell it to the man who gives the highest price; and then you will have your salt springs developed. But so long as you undertake to maintain the relation of landlord to the persons who are going to carry on these salt-works, so long they will remain in an undeveloped state, and the country will never realize a tenth part of the advantage from the salt springs that we would realize if they were conducted by private enterprise alone. That is the experience of this Government and has been from its foundation. It is the experience of every Government on the face of the earth. All such enterprises as this should be carried on by private energy and by private means; and so long as you allow the man who conducts it to be the owner of the property, so long he will be willing to invest more and more means in the appliances that may be necessary to conduct his business to a successful result.

Mr. President, I feel a great deal of interest in this subject. I do not know of any salt springs that are of any value on the public domain except those in Kansas and Nebraska, immediately west of the State in which I live. We hope that the time is not far distant when we shall be able to secure our supply of salt from that region. We do not want to be compelled to become tributary to any such parties as may happen to be able to secure a long lease under the provisions of the bill that now lies upon your table. How long are these leases to run? What are the terms upon which they are to be made? We put the entire thing, if the bill passes, into the keeping of one man, and we may be bound up, as I understand, if I recollect the provisions of the bill, for an indefinite period.

Mr. HARRIS. The leases are not to be for a longer period than twenty-five years.

Mr. GRIMES. We shall be bound up for twenty-five years, almost the length of a generation. I move that this bill be postponed until the first day of the next session. It is a bill which we ought not to pass at any time, in my opinion, but certainly we ought not to pass such a bill as this without the most mature reflection. The idea of this bill is that the Government shall become a landlord. Why do you not apply the principle to your iron ores? Why do you not apply it in the same manner to all your iron on Lake Superior and in Missouri? Why do you not apply it to your gold and silver? Why is it that this absolute necessity of life, without which we cannot exist at all, is selected and put into the keeping of a few men who manage to secure a lease from the Government?

Mr. STEWART. I do not like the principle of this bill. It is not guarded so as to protect the people in these salt regions. It simply authorizes the Interior Department to lease the mineral springs. Of course those leases will depend upon the representations that the parties interested make to the Interior Department. It does not provide for having surveys or any authentic information on which we could act. Under the bill, one individual may obtain leases for all the mineral springs in a given section at a nominal price, and thus monopolize this most essential article for the region round about those springs. The cost of it at present depends principally upon the freight. This bill throws it open to vast monopolies, and in my judgment it is a very dangerous bill.

If there is to be anything done with salt mines or any other mines the plan should be, when there is sufficient information about them, to bring them into market, when it can be done equitably. When the subject is understood; when a plan shall have been developed and we have acquired sufficient information to act upon it, let these salt springs and saline lands fall into private hands; let there be competition; let anybody make salt who desires to do so; but let us prevent a monopolizing of salt mining. Whenever a plan of that kind can be matured, we should pass it; but until then there should not be any action on the subject. Until then it ought not to be in the power of the Secretary of the Interior, or any other head of a Department, to make contracts whereby these most necessary springs shall be monopolized. It is a very dangerous thing. I do not know the extent of the springs in the East, in Kansas and Nebraska, but I know—

Mr. HOWARD. I wish to ask the Senator from Nevada whether it is not better that the Government should put these saline springs under some regulations, so that the rights of all parties to them may be understood and settled, rather than that the springs should become the object of a scramble on the part of squatters to go and take possession of them, and to hold them in defiance of the rest of the public and to the prejudice of the Government, while the spring itself yields no sort of revenue at all. That I understand to be the state of facts in regard to very many of these salt springs.

Mr. GRIMES. Let me say to the Senator he is entirely mistaken. All salt springs are reserved.

Mr. HOWARD. I know they are.

Mr. GRIMES. Nobody can take a preëmption on them; nobody can occupy them as squatters.

Mr. HOWARD. I do not speak of preëmption. Certainly they are not subject to preëmption, but they are subject to forcible entry and detainer on the part of the squatter, if he is bold enough to enter and take possession; and that is almost universally the case, I understand. The object of this bill is to endeavor to get some revenue for the Government and reduce the thing to regularity, so that the people may know what their rights are.

Mr. STEWART. There will be no revenue; that you may decide on in advance; there will be no revenue to the Government, but there will be some oppression to the people unless the bill is properly guarded.

Mr. DOOLITTLE. If the Senator will allow me, I will state a fact which occurred in Wisconsin, and which perhaps may illustrate this matter of leasing mines. The Government of the United States undertook to lease mineral lands in the State of Wisconsin and in the northern part of Illinois and Iowa. They leased them at a very early day. The result was that after considerable experimenting they abandoned the whole thing; and they paid back from the Treasury all the money they ever received from the lessees; and since I have been a member of Congress there have been one or two claims presented, and Congress has, by law, paid back the money which had once been received from the lease of the lead mines. Then there were agents and salaries and all that connected with the leasing. Now, some of these salt mines and mineral springs are found overflowing upon the face of the earth, but the great mass of salt springs are always found as we find the petroleum, by boring into the earth and finding the springs; and this matter of finding salt springs is a matter of mining, just like the mining for minerals of any sort. I think, however, that our experience in Wisconsin and Illinois is anything but such an experience as would induce us to enter upon such a policy in relation to the salt springs.

Mr. STEWART. I do not wish to be understood as being opposed to any regulation by Congress on this subject. Whenever it can be understood and investigated so that a bill can be prepared whereby parties desiring to mine in these salt springs can obtain title, and that in small quantities, sufficient for their operations and no more, I shall favor such a bill. I am in favor of these salt springs falling into the hands of private proprietors as soon as possible. What I am opposed to is an arrangement whereby an unlimited quantity of leases of lands can be obtained, under the pretext that there are salt springs upon them, by a few individuals, the Department having no means of ascertaining how the thing is situated except by the representations of the parties who desire the leases. I am utterly opposed to inaugurating a system of this kind. The salt springs and salt mines ought to be in the hands of private proprietors. I know very well that if a bill of this kind were passed, it would be practical ruin to the State which I represent. There is salt enough in that State to supply the civilized world during all time. It is, only a question of freight. There is any amount of it there. There is a salt bed there which is said by those who have examined it to be the most remarkable that has ever been found in the world. It has never been surveyed, but it contains probably several thousand acres of rock salt in a pure state. It is of vast use to the community there. It costs only the expense of freight. Salt is essential in mining. A mining region could not progress without it. It is one of the essential elements of mining. The mining of it there now is free to all. If you allow men to lease these saline lands and monopolize them for twenty-five years, it would destroy the prosperity of the State. When a system shall be devised to operate all over the United States, allowing these lands to fall into the hands of private proprietors, so that there shall be no monopoly, no harm done to anybody, it is desirable that it should be done.

The Senate has passed a bill to allow the mineral lands to fall into the hands of private proprietors. I think it was said here that the miners would oppose it; but all the miners, so far as heard from, approve it. All they want is that the mines shall not be monopolized, but shall go into the hands of private parties, on the principle of the greatest good to the greatest number. I say, let the circumstances in regard to these salt springs be understood; let a bill be introduced; let it be perfected at the next session, or the session afterwards, if it cannot be done then. Let it be intelligently understood; let it prevent the possibility of these salt springs falling into the hands of a few; and then I shall favor the passage of such a bill. It is true that the present bill does not apply west of the one hundredth meridian; but still there are important interests connected with these salt springs in the East, and it will be a bad precedent. I am afraid if it is applied to any portion of the United States, it may eventually be applied to the whole country. Such a system, applied to the whole country, would be most destructive and most disastrous. It should never be applied to such a thing as salt, which is so essential for domestic use in the East, and so essential both for domestic use and mining in the West. These salt springs and lands should be so divided out and apportioned out among the bona fide salt miners that the whole community shall not suffer.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The morning hour having expired, it becomes the duty of the Chair to call up the unfinished business of yesterday, which is Senate bill No. 387.

USE OF THE MARBLE ROOM.

Mr. TRUMBULL. Before proceeding with that bill I ask the permission of the Senate, and of the Senator who has it in charge, to submit a resolution to which I trust there will be no objection. I will state before the resolution is read that there is a misunderstanding in regard to the rules of the Senate. The ante-room, known as the Marble Room, has always been used as a retiring room for Senators, and such persons as they might wish to consult with during the open sessions of the Senate, and it is very convenient to have that use. We must have some place where we can take the persons who call upon us aside. The officers of the Senate understand the Marble Room to be a part of the floor of the Senate. It has never been so understood since I have been a member of this body. I think it is a misconstruction of the rule. But in order that there may be no difficulty about it I offer a resolution on the subject, which I ask the Secretary to read, and to which I trust there will be no objection.

The Secretary read the resolution, as follows:

Resolved, That the ante-room, known as the Marble Room, being designed as a retiring room for Senators and such persons as they may think proper to invite into the same, the officers of the Senate be directed not to interfere with such use of said room during the open sessions of the Senate.

The resolution was considered by unanimous consent, and agreed to.

CALEB T. FAY AND WILLIAM Y. PATCH.

Mr. CONNESS. With the consent of the honorable Senator having charge of the pending business, I ask unanimous consent to offer a resolution authorizing the Secretary of the Treasury to audit and settle the accounts of Caleb T. Fay and William Y. Patch, late assessor and collector of internal revenue at San Francisco. I also ask for the reading of the accompanying letter from the Secretary of the Treasury with the resolution.

The Secretary read the resolution, as follows:

Resolved by the Senate, (the House of Representatives concurring,) That the Secretary of the Treasury be authorized to audit and settle the accounts of Caleb T. Fay and William Y. Patch, late assessor and collector of internal revenue at San Francisco, as to him may appear just and equitable.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Senator from California asks for the present consideration of the resolution. Is there any objection?

Mr. CLARK. I do not like to object to a resolution of this kind—

Mr. CONNESS. Will the Senator hear the letter of the Secretary of the Treasury read?

Mr. CLARK. Not now, because that would be the consideration of the resolution. I do not like this way of having a bill come up, and then allowing various little matters to come in, with the consent of the Senator having it in charge, because it tends to confuse business and is merely a method of getting in one thing ahead of another. I have not the least objection to the Senator's resolution; but I have an objection to its being considered while the other bill is really before the Senate.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. Is there any objection to the present consideration of the resolution submitted by the Senator from California?

Mr. CLARK. I object.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. Objection being made, it lies over under the rule.

Mr. CONNESS. I desire to get the attention of the Chair to make an explanation.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. No explanation can be made when there is an objection to the consideration of the resolution. The first question is, Will the Senate unanimously consent to consider the resolution now? And any objection carries it over.

Mr. CLARK. I will withdraw the objection if the Senator desires to make an explanation, if I can have the privilege of objecting afterward.

Mr. CONNESS. Certainly.

Mr. CLARK. That will be for the Chair to decide.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Chair thinks that if the objection be withdrawn for the purpose of explanation, it is withdrawn altogether, and that the resolution is before the Senate to be considered.

Mr. SHERMAN. I object to it, because I think it is a waste of time to be introducing resolutions in this way.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. Objection being made, the resolution lies over.

NORTHERN PACIFIC RAILROAD.

The Senate, as in Committee of the Whole, proceeded to consider the bill (S. No. 387) to secure the speedy construction of the Northern Pacific railroad and telegraph line, and to secure to the Government the use of the same for postal, military, and other purposes.

The first section of the bill, for the purpose of securing the construction of the Northern Pacific railroad and telegraph at the earliest practicable time, directs the Secretary of the Treasury, whenever and as often as the commissioners named in the fourth section of the act of incorporation shall report the completion of twenty-five or more consecutive miles of the road, to pledge the credit of the United States, in such form as the Secretary of the Treasury shall prescribe, to the payment of the interest of the stock of the company on the portion of the road thus completed, and at the rate per mile hereinafter specified, from the date of its issue and for a period not exceeding twenty years from that date, at the rate of six percent. per annum, payable semi-annually on the 1st days of July and January in each and every year, in the legal currency of the United States at the Treasury of the United States or any of its depositories, to the following extent, namely: for that portion of the road which is embraced between its eastern point or points of commencement, wherever the same shall be hereafter located, and the one hundred and first meridian, the interest upon two hundred and forty-nine shares per mile; between the one hundred and first and the one hundred and eleventh meridians, the interest upon three hundred and twenty shares per mile for six hundred and twenty miles; between the one hundred and eleventh and the one hundred and nineteenth meridians, being the mountain district, the interest upon nine hundred and eighty-nine shares per mile for five hundred and twenty miles; and between the one hundred and nineteenth meridian and the western point or points of termination, including the mountain ranges of the coast, the interest upon five hundred and seventy shares per mile.

The Committee on the Pacific Railroad proposed to amend the bill by adding to the first section the following clause:

And it shall be the duty of the board of directors of said company, under such rules and regulations as the Secretary of the Treasury may prescribe, to designate on the certificates of stock upon which such pledge of credit is to be given the particular section or portion of said railroad to which the certificate applies; and it shall be the duty of the Secretary of the Treasury to keep an accurate record of all such certificates, and to communicate such record, from time to time, to the Secretary of the Interior.

The amendment was agreed to.

The second section of the bill, for the purpose of relieving the Treasury of the United States at the earliest practicable time from the payment of interest on the stock described, directs the treasurer of the Northern Pacific Railroad Company, on the 1st days of April and October in each and every year, to pay into the Treasury of the United States so much of the proceeds of the sales of all the lands granted by the charter of the company, situated on the southerly side of the line of the railroad, as may be necessary to reimburse the Government for any moneys paid for interest. In case the money thus paid into the Treasury of the United States shall not be sufficient to reimburse the Government for interest paid on the stock, then for the further security of the Government for the payment of the interest over and above the deposit of the proceeds of the sale of lands, after the completion of the road according to the provisions of its charter, so that its cars shall run from its eastern terminus on Lake Superior, to Puget sound, the treasurer of the company is to pay into the Treasury of the United States one quarter part the net earnings of the road, to be applied to the payment of the interest on the stock as before provided, until the amount so paid by the company shall be equal to the amount paid by the United States as provided in section first, after which all further payments shall cease; and to secure the payment of the deposit of the proceeds of the sales of the public lands as before provided, and quarter part of the net earnings, the Secretary of the Treasury, whenever in his judgment it shall be necessary for the safety of the Government to do so, is empowered to appoint an inspector, who shall have authority to examine the books and accounts of the company, and to direct the application of the net earnings and the deposit of the proceeds of the sales of the public lands.

The third section provides that none of the lands granted to the company shall be subject to any general or local tax for any purpose whatever till the lands shall have been finally sold and conveyed by the company, and that all expenses for engineering and commissioners provided for or required by this act shall be paid by the company.

The Committee on the Pacific Railroad proposed to amend this section by striking out the words "that none of the lands granted to said company shall be subject to any general or local tax for any purpose whatever until said lands shall have been finally sold and conveyed by said company, and."

The amendment was agreed to.

The committee also proposed to add to section three the following words: "and that the lands to which said company shall be entitled shall not be subject to any general or local taxation for any purpose whatever for the period of five years after the issuing of patents for the same."

The amendment was agreed to.

The committee proposed to strike out section four in these words:

Sec. 4. And be it further enacted, That whenever any grant, donation, power, or franchise shall be granted to and accepted by, or in any manner be acquired by, the Northern Pacific Railroad Company, in conformity with the provision of its act of incorporation, the acceptance by said Northern Pacific Railroad Company of said grant, franchise, donation, or power, shall confer upon the Northern Pacific Railroad Company all the rights, powers, and privileges of the grant or franchise so transferred and accepted, and the provisions of this act, together with all the privileges, grants, rights, immunities, limitations, and restrictions of the said act incorporating the Northern Pacific Railroad Company, shall be construed to apply to all such grants, franchises, and powers as may be conferred upon or acquired by the Northern Pacific Railroad Company, in the same manner and to the same effect as if such acquired grant, franchise, or power had been a part of the original line and grant of said company: Provided, That this section shall not be construed to authorize any pledge of the credit of the United States further than is hereinbefore in this act provided for.

The amendment was agreed to.

Section [five] four provides that the company may within the limitation prescribed by this act and the original act of incorporation from time to time alter and change the location of its line wherever such change will the better carry out the purposes set forth in the act of incorporation, by filing in the office of the Secretary of the Interior a description of the new line adopted; and that the line upon which the road shall be finally located and constructed shall determine the location of the lands granted to the company by its act of incorporation. And the company is to have power to increase its capital stock, if the same shall be necessary for the completion of its road, to an amount not exceeding $150,000,000.

Section [six] five provides that three fourths of the board of directors shall always be citizens of the United States, and that no money shall be paid on account of this bill until an appropriation shall have been made for that purpose; and the words "Puget sound" in the charter and in this act shall be construed to mean all the waters connected with the Straits of Juan de Fuca.

The committee proposed to amend the section by inserting after the word "directors," in line two, the words "of said company."

The amendment was agreed to.

The next amendment was in the same section, lines three, four, and five, to strike out the words "and that no money shall be paid on account of this bill until an appropriation shall have been made for that purpose."

Mr. HOWARD. I hope the Senate will not concur in the amendment.

Mr. GRIMES. Why?

Mr. HOWARD. The reason for not concurring is that if the words be stricken out, when the bill goes to the House of Representatives it will become necessary to refer it to the Committee of the Whole.

Mr. GRIMES. Do I understand, then, that the bill makes an appropriation?

Mr. HOWARD. It does not make an appropriation.

Mr. GRIMES. Then why does the Senator desire to strike out those words?

Mr. HOWARD. It makes no appropriation.

Mr. GRIMES. Certainly; the idea is that the officers will be justified in paying out the money if these words are stricken out.

The question being put on the amendment, there were, upon a division—ayes 7, noes 15; no quorum voting.

Mr. GRIMES called for the yeas and nays, and they were ordered.

Mr. EDMUNDS. The object of this clause, as I understand it, is that this shall, after all, be kept within the control of Congress, and that the Treasury shall not pay out money in support of this grant unless there shall be a specific appropriation for that purpose. The committee supposing that to be unnecessary, in reporting the bill thought it proper to strike out those words. Now, in my opinion, they ought to stand, so as to keep it within the control of Congress, and in that opinion I understand the committee now concur.

Mr. HOWARD. Certainly.

Mr. EDMUNDS. Therefore I am desirous that the Senate should disagree to this recommendation of the committee, leaving these words to stand, so that it be a part of the law that money shall not be paid out without an appropriation for it. I am sure with that understanding no gentleman can object to retaining the words.

Mr. SHERMAN. On the question being put, I voted for striking them out, but I see that I voted under a misapprehension. I think the words ought to be retained in the bill, and then Congress may judge from time to time whether they will make appropriations.

Mr. HOWARD. Certainly; and that is my motion: that the Senate non-concur in this amendment of the committee.

Mr. POMEROY. If the Chair will put the question again it will be understood without calling the yeas and nays.

The PRESIDING OFFICER, (Mr. ANTHONY in the chair.) The call for the yeas and nays may be withdrawn by unanimous consent.

Mr. CLARK. I do not see how that can be. The last decision of the Chair was that there was no quorum. It is not competent to do any business until it is ascertained that there is a quorum here.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Senator from New Hampshire is correct.

Mr. GRIMES, and others. That can be ascertained by another division.

Mr. CLARK. I have no objection to allowing the call for the yeas and nays to be withdrawn by unanimous consent if we are to have another division.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Chair will regard the call for the yeas and nays as being withdrawn, and will put the question again on the amendment.

The question being put, there were, on a division—ayes none, noes thirty.

So the amendment was rejected.

Section [seven] six provides that the act shall take effect on and after its passage. The committee proposed to strike out the words "this act shall take effect on and after its passage," and to insert "Congress may at any time alter, amend, or repeal this act."

The amendment was agreed to.

Mr. HOWARD. I move to amend the fifth section by inserting "at least" after "that," in line one of section five; so as to read, "that at least three fourths of the board of directors of said company shall always be citizens of the United States."

The amendment was agreed to.

The bill was reported to the Senate as amended and the amendments were concurred in.

Mr. SHERMAN. I must confess my surprise, and under the circumstances of the country my chagrin, at the probable passage of a bill of this character at this period of the session. I supposed that when this project was introduced into the House of Representatives, elaborately debated and discussed there, and defeated by a very decided vote, after a full understanding of the subject, a more objectionable bill would not then be introduced into the Senate and be forced through at this period of the session. This bill proposes to grant to an existing corporation a guarantee of stock to the amount of $102,143,000; and it proposes to pay to this company $122,571,600. This company has already received from Congress a grant of land amounting to forty-seven million three hundred and sixty thousand acres, being twice the grant given to the same length of line of the Union Pacific railroad or any other railroad that ever was proposed or projected in this country. The land grant made to this railroad is twice as large as any that has been made to any other railroad; and it was on the express ground that it was to be a land-grant road. It was introduced and advocated and we passed it on the specific stipulation that no money grant and no guarantee should be made to this road. Its projectors pledged themselves and their reputation that they would build it upon the grant of land; and I remember very well that the chairman of the Committee on Public Lands, in introducing the bill, said that the grant was made twice as large as to any other road on that ground.

Mr. POMEROY. I wish to correct the Senator in one respect. The bill came from another committee altogether. It was reported by the Senator from Wisconsin. I was not on the committee that reported the bill. I objected a little to the grant of land on the ground that it was too large, but finally yielded to it because the road was to be a land-grant road.

Mr. SHERMAN. I remember hearing the Senator from Kansas state distinctly that he yielded to the grant on the ground that it was a Pacific railroad which was to receive no money, and therefore was entitled to double the usual grant of land.

Mr. POMEROY. But it came from another committee altogether.

Mr. SHERMAN. Very well. Here is a company which we organized ourselves, building a line of railroad along the British possessions to a port belonging to Great Britain, on the northern boundary of our country, to which we have already granted forty-seven million acres of the public lands on what they claim to be a favorable route, and upon a promise and guarantee that they would build the road for that amount of land. It is now proposed that we shall give to this company money to the amount of $122,000,000. It is true that the company agrees to repay this, but what security have we for it? A mortgage of one half the land we give them! That is all. That is to say, we give them twice as much land as we have ever given to any other railroad company; and they mortgage the excess to us for our security! They do not agree to pay back any portion of the money paid by us until after this road is completed, and a continuous line is run along it from Lake Superior to the Pacific ocean. The second section of the bill shows that they do not set apart any of the proceeds of the road or make any agreement to refund the money until after the road is completed and finished. We are expected to pay this large sum of money in addition to the land grant, receiving nothing back except the proceeds of half the land we give them, and to wait for the interest we pay until the road is completed; and then there is no stipulation to pay the money, but there is a stipulation that they will set aside one fourth of the net proceeds of the road for the purpose of paying the Government.

Now, when you look at this bill, it is simply a gratuity of this sum of money at this period of our history to build a rival road to one which we are now engaged in constructing—a gratuity made in violation of the pledge and promise of those men who embarked in this road. It is rival to a road in which we have already embarked a guarantee of more than one hundred million dollars, for the building of which we are now daily issuing thirty-year bonds of the United States bearing six per cent. interest. It seemed to me yesterday, when it was proposed to take up this bill at this period of the session, that it might properly be resisted; and I should be very sorry indeed if we proceeded to any definite or conclusive vote.

As I said before, this bill, but in a less objectionable form, was debated in the other House for a long time, was fully considered, and was voted down by a vote of, I think, 76 to 56. Is it expected now that by passing the bill at this period of the session in such a form that when it goes to the House of Representatives it will not be necessary, according to the rules of that body, to refer it to a committee, you will be able to push it through that body? It is purposely framed with a view to avoid a reference to a committee in the House of Representatives, because the provision in this bill which was voted upon by the Senate a few minutes ago could only have been inserted for the very purpose of avoiding and evading the rule of the House of Representatives which requires bills involving appropriations of money to go to a committee. That clause was inserted for no other purpose except to enable the managers of this bill to pass it through the House of Representatives without reference to a committee. As the bill stands it may go to the House of Representatives, be taken from the Speaker's table, and forced to a final vote without a reference to any committee.

Mr. FESSENDEN. Why, then, did the Senator vote to retain that clause?

Mr. SHERMAN. I wanted the Senate to have the bill before it just as it is. I wanted to show precisely the purpose of it. I did not want to patch up the bill.

Mr. FESSENDEN. Suppose this clause was stricken out, as was recommended by the committee originally, what would be the result?

Mr. SHERMAN. Even then, if my friend from Maine will examine the phraseology of the bill, he will see that it avoids all appropriations, and that the declaration made in the clause referred to is but a declaration of the legal effect of the bill. Under the custom of the House, whenever a bill not only makes appropriations but makes a contract for an appropriation, they have usually held it to demand and require a reference. That is the point; but the clause alluded to is only putting in what is actually the legal effect of the bill; and it is done, and can only be done, for that purpose, in my judgment.

Mr. GRIMES. I inquire of the Senator if this bill did not come from the Committee on the Pacific Railroad.

Mr. SHERMAN. It came from the Pacific Railroad Committee; but that committee was divided about it. I thought a majority of the committee was against it, but I am not prepared to say that. Perhaps I ought not to say anything about the committee; but it is a fact that the Pacific Railroad Committee is divided on the bill. I am a member of this committee, and I am certainly opposed to the bill.

It seems to me that the passage of this bill, or of any bill of a kindred character, at this session of Congress, will tend to impair the public credit. The readiness with which, now being scarcely over a great civil war, with a debt of $3,000,000,000 upon our shoulders, we embark in new enterprises before we have got to the hard-pan of specie payments; the readiness with which we contract now upon the basis of an inflated currency, when every dollar of this money will have to be paid in gold and silver, does tend to destroy the public credit.

Men who are prudent and careful will look upon reckless legislation of this kind, as I declare this to be, as tending more than anything else to impair the public credit. This world was not created in a day. Our generation is not to be expected to complete all the roads to the Pacific and all the works of internal improvement which may be devised by man. And when we are now less able to contract debt than ever before, when the debts we now contract are upon the basis of paper money, but must be fulfilled upon the basis of gold, we seem to be willing to embark in all sorts of enterprises. It is proposed that we shall embark in building a ship-canal in opposition to the canal of New York. It is proposed now that we shall build a second line of railroad to the Pacific.

If we pass this bill, with what right, with what show of justice or manliness can you refuse to build the Southern Pacific railroad? When the southern representatives come here, and demand aid for building a railroad through Texas and along the southern border, and say to you that you not only have a great Central Pacific railroad which accomplishes the national purpose of connecting the Pacific with the Atlantic, but that you have availed yourselves of their absence to appropriate $120,000,000 to build a northern border road along the British possessions, how can you refuse to build a Southern Pacific railroad, or to give the same aid for it? You cannot do it. The very spirit of manliness and fair play will demand of Congress similar grants to that road.

In my judgment, prudence, a reasonable caution, a reasonable common sense requires us to confine ourselves now to the contracts we have already entered into. It is manifest that if the thing was to be done over again we should not build any of the branches provided for the present Pacific railroad, but we should confine the aid of the Government to building one great line of railroad from some point in the West to the Pacific. All these branches have been constant sources of trouble and annoyance, demanding constant changes in legislation. If we were to do the thing over again, it is admitted, I believe, on all hands, that it would be wisest and best to build one great line of railroad through to the Pacific ocean; but now it is proposed, in addition to the three eastern branches already provided for, to build another railroad stretching along our northern border with a gratuity of $122,000,000 given to it and forty-seven million acres of the public lands.

I trust that the Senate will vote down this measure, or at least give us a little time for its consideration. This bill was never submitted to the Committee on the Pacific Railroad until within the last month. We never held, when I was present at least, more than one session of the committee to consider its provisions. There are no guards or guarantees thrown around this bill. The declaration was made in the committee that only last winter the grant of land of forty-seven million acres was about to be transferred to a foreign company and to be controlled by a foreign company. The only guard in this bill against the transfer of these public lands and of this large sum of money to a foreign corporation is the simple clause that three fourths of the directors shall be citizens of the United States. How easy would it be to have men of straw, citizens of the United States, made directors of this great and powerful corporation, and have the whole control of it in British hands! You have no guard against the very danger that these men once endeavored to defeat, and perhaps did defeat for the time being, except the simple provision that three fourths of the directors shall be American citizens. How easy would it be for British interests, controlling our trade for a hostile purpose, to get control of the board of directors by owning the stock, and compel the United States of America to pour into its coffers $122,000,000, enough, in my judgment, to build the road, and a grant of forty-seven million acres of lands. Foreign capitalists may take the charter, use our money to build the road, and control the charter and the road for foreign purposes.

Sir, I do not wish, at this period of the session and under the intense heat which we are now suffering, to enter further into the discussion of the measure. At the next session, if it should be postponed after debate, I will examine the subject more carefully. No one can say of me that I am hostile to any portion of the country through which this road passes. On the contrary, my reading of the reports has tended to convince me that the Northern Pacific route is a feasible route; that the fall in the spurs of the mountains along the forty-seventh and forty-eighth parallels may make it comparatively easy to build the road; and if the friends of the road are to be believed, they can build it for less than one hundred million dollars in gold. I have heard men who have traversed along this route say that there would be no trouble in building the road for about one hundred million dollars upon a gold basis. If so, the grant we have already given of forty-seven million acres of land ought to be enough aid, because, after all, the United States get no benefit from this road except the effect it has upon the improvement of the country. All the profits, all the tolls, all the charges for transportation and for passengers go into private hands. The Government takes all the risk, gives all the money, grants all the land, and receives in return—what? A mortgage of one half its own lands and a promise to pay over one fourth of the net proceeds of the road after it is fully completed. That is, the builders of the road receive forty-seven million acres of land and give us twenty-three millions of them; they take three fourths of the net earnings and we take one fourth! That is the proposition contained in this bill. It seems to me the mere statement of it is sufficient to put us on our guard, at least against any hurried passage of the bill.

Mr. HOWARD. Mr. President—

Mr. POMEROY. If this bill is to be discussed I desire to be allowed to present a report from a committee of conference. Does the Senator desire a vote on this bill to-day?

Mr. HOWARD. Certainly. I desire a vote on it at the earliest practicable moment.

Mr. POMEROY. Will the Senator yield to allow me to submit a report from a committee of conference?

Mr. HOWARD. I am willing to yield for that purpose.

NORTHERN KANSAS RAILROAD.

Mr. POMEROY submitted the following report:

The committee of conference on the disagreeing votes of the two Houses on the bill (S. No. 145) entitled "An act for a grant of land to the State of Kansas to aid in the construction of the Northern Kansas railroad and telegraph," having met, after full and free conference have agreed to recommend, and do recommend, to their respective Houses as follows:

That the Senate agree to the amendment of the House, with an amendment, as follows: strike out all after the word "that," in the first line, section one, of said bill, and insert in lieu thereof the following:

"There is hereby granted to the State of Kansas for the use and benefit of the St. Joseph and Denver City Railroad Company, the same being a corporation organized under the laws of the State of Kansas, to construct and operate a railroad from Elwood, in Kansas, westwardly, via Marysville, in the same State, so as to effect a junction with the Union Pacific railroad, or any branch thereof not further west than the one hundredth meridian of west longitude, every alternate section of land in Kansas, designated by odd numbers, for ten sections in width on each side of said road, to the point of intersection. But in case it shall appear that the United States have, when the line or route of said road is definitely fixed, sold any section or any part thereof, granted as aforesaid, or that the right of preemption or homestead settlement has attached to the same, or that the same has been reserved by the United States for any purpose whatever, then it shall be the duty of the Secretary of the Interior to cause to be selected for the purposes aforesaid, from the public lands of the United States nearest to tiers of sections above specified, so much land, in alternate sections or parts of sections designated by odd numbers, as shall be equal to such lands as the United States have sold, reserved, or otherwise appropriated, or to which the rights of preemption or homestead settlements have attached as aforesaid; which lands, thus indicated by odd numbers, and selected by direction of the Secretary of the Interior as aforesaid, shall be held by the State of Kansas for the use and purpose aforesaid: Provided, That the land to be so selected shall in no case be located further than twenty miles from the line of said road: Provided further, That the land hereby granted for and on account of said road shall be exclusively applied in the construction of the same, and for no other purpose whatever, and shall be disposed of as in this act hereinafter provided: Provided also, That no part of the land granted by this act shall be applied to aid in the construction of any railroad or part thereof for the construction of which any previous grant of land or bonds has been made by Congress: And provided further, That any and all lands heretofore reserved to the United States by any act of Congress, or in any other manner by competent authority, for the purpose of aiding in any object of internal improvement, or for any other purpose whatsoever, be, and the same are hereby, reserved to the United States from the operations of this act, except so far as it may be found necessary to locate the route of said road through said lands, in which case the right of way, one hundred feet in width on each side of said road only shall be granted, subject to the approval of the President of the United States.

"Sec. 2. And be it further enacted, That the sections and parts of sections of land which by said grant shall remain to the United States, within ten miles on each side of said road, shall not be sold for less than double the minimum price of the public lands when sold; nor shall any of said lands become subject to sale at private entry until the same shall have been first offered at public sale to the highest bidder, at or above the increased minimum price, as aforesaid: Provided, That actual and bona fide settlers, under the provisions of the preemption and homestead laws of the United States, may, after due proof of settlement, improvement, cultivation, and occupation, as now provided by law, purchase the same at the increased minimum price aforesaid: And provided also, That settlers on any of said reserve sections, under the provisions of the homestead law, who improve, occupy, and cultivate the same for a period of five years, and comply with the several conditions and requirements of said act, shall be entitled to patents for an amount not exceeding eighty acres each, anything in this act to the contrary notwithstanding.

"Sec. 3. And be it further enacted, That the grant of lands hereby made is upon condition that said company, after the construction of its road, shall keep it in repair and use, and shall at all times be in readiness to transport troops, munitions of war, supplies and public stores upon its road for the Government when required to do so by any Department thereof, the Government at all times having the preference in the use of the road for all the purposes aforesaid at fair and reasonable rates of compensation, not exceeding that paid by private individuals or the average paid for like services on other roads. And the lands hereby granted, held, and reserved as aforesaid shall inure to the benefit of said company, as follows: when the Governor of the State of Kansas shall certify that any section of ten consecutive miles of said road is completed in a good, substantial, and workmanlike manner as a first-class railroad, then the said Secretary of the Interior shall issue to the said company patents for so many sections of the land hereinbefore granted as lie opposite to and contiguous with the said completed sections; and when certificates of the Governor, aforesaid, shall be presented to said Secretary of the completion, as aforesaid, of each successive section of ten consecutive miles of said road, the said Secretary shall in like manner issue to said company patents for the said sections of said land, as aforesaid, for each of said sections of road until said road shall be completed: Provided, That if said railroad company or its assigns shall fail to complete at least one section of said road each year from the date of its acceptance of the grant provided for in this act, then its right to the lands for said section so failing of completion shall revert to the Government of the United States: Provided further, That if said road is not completed within ten years from the date of the acceptance of the grant hereinbefore made, the lands remaining unpatented shall revert to the United States.

"Sec. 4. And be it further enacted, That as soon as the said company shall file with the Secretary of the Interior maps of its line, designating the route thereof, it shall be the duty of the said Secretary to withdraw from the market the lands granted by this act, in such manner as may be best calculated to effect the purposes of this act and subserve the public interest.

"Sec. 5. And be it further enacted, That the United States mail shall be transported on said road and its extension, under the direction of the Post Office Department, at such price as Congress may by law provide: Provided, That until such price is fixed by law the Postmaster General shall have power to fix the compensation.

"Sec. 6. And be it further enacted, That the right of way through the public lands be, and the same is hereby, granted to said St. Joseph and Denver City Railroad Company, its successors and assigns, for the construction of a railroad as proposed; and the right is hereby given to said corporation to take from the public lands adjacent to the line of said road material for the construction thereof. Said way is granted to said railroad to the extent of one hundred feet in width on each side of said road where it may pass through the public domain; also all necessary ground for station buildings, workshops, depots, machine-shops, switches, side-tracks, turn-tables, and water-tanks.

"Sec. 7. And be it further enacted, That the acceptance of the terms, conditions, and impositions of this act by the said St. Joseph and Denver City Railroad Company shall be signified in writing, under the corporate seal of the said company, duly executed pursuant to the direction of its board of directors first had and obtained, which acceptance shall be made within six months after the passage of this act and not afterward, and shall be deposited with the Secretary of the Interior."

And that the House agree to the same.

S. C. POMEROY,
B. GRATZ BROWN,
GEORGE READ RIDDLE,
Managers on the part of the Senate.
BENJAMIN F. LOAN,
SIDNEY CLARKE,
CHARLES A. ELDRIDGE,
Managers on the part of the House.

Mr. HOWARD. Of course it is utterly impossible for the Senate to understand the effect of the report of the committee of conference in this case. We have hardly listened to a word of it, and if we had listened with ever so much care we could not ascertain from the mere reading what will be the application and effect of the bill now proposed. I suggest to the Senator from Kansas the propriety of referring this report to the Committee on the Pacific Railroad, or to some other one of the standing committees of the Senate, in order that it may be examined, and that we may vote with more intelligence than we shall do now if we are required to vote upon it. I understand it is almost entirely a new bill, a new measure.

Mr. POMEROY. No, sir.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. A motion to refer to a standing committee a report of a committee of conference is not in order.

Mr. POMEROY. I will explain in a word that the difficulty with the bill was that it came from the Pacific Railroad Committee of the other House, who incorporated into it their system rather than the system adopted by the Committee on Public Lands. We have always reported our bills, putting in what is called the continuous principle, allowing no lands to be patented faster than each section of road is built. We have also always provided that the United States shall deal with States and not with companies. But the Pacific Railroad Committee, neither of the Senate nor of the House, regard these things; and when a bill goes to the Pacific Railroad Committee, it comes back in the shape of the former legislation which we had ten years ago; that is, giving lands one section in advance of completing any road; that is to say, the company get one hundred and twenty sections of land before they do anything. Under our system, the new legislation, they must build the road before they get any land, and as this bill is guarded there must be a hundred miles of road built before any land is granted.

The committee of conference thought it best to write it all out plain, make a model bill, one that we consider perfect, rather than to pursue the other course of numbering amendments, accepting some and receding from others by their numbers, so that nobody would know anything about it. The committee therefore wrote out in full exactly what they did mean; and it is regarded by those who have examined it as a most perfect model for a bill, because it has all the provisions that the Senate committee have insisted upon for the last four years, and these provisions are not insisted upon by the Pacific Railroad Committee.

Mr. CONNESS. I do not know anything about the bill that is now before us in the shape of a report from the committee of conference, and consequently shall not speak about it; I cannot tell what it is by hearing it read; but the statement of the honorable Senator in regard to the manner of transacting business in the Committee on the Pacific Railroad, I undertake to say, is not at all correct; and I am a little astonished that the honorable Senator, who is the chairman of the Committee on Public Lands, should avail himself of the opportunity to make such a statement as he has made.

Mr. POMEROY. It is entirely correct, so far as relates to the House Committee; it may not be as to the Senate Committee on the Pacific Railroad.

Mr. CONNESS. The statement of the honorable Senator was that what he stated was the practice of the Committee on the Pacific Railroad, both of the House of Representatives and of the Senate; and the report made by the reporter will show that to have been the Senator's statement.

Mr. POMEROY. I will correct it so far as relates to the committee on the part of the Senate. I think I was wrong in that respect.

Mr. CONNESS. The Senator then withdraws the charge so far as relates to the committee on the part of the Senate. I rose to say that the committee on the part of the Senate had not, since I had a seat in it, reported any bill which proposed to pass the title of an acre of land to any company whatever until the road was first built. The statement of the Senator was utterly and entirely incorrect, and a mistake; and it is a very wrong thing for a Senator to undertake to make an impression of this kind against a committee of this body who have taken so much care as the Committee on the Pacific Railroad have.

Mr. POMEROY. The Senator will agree with me, I think, that my remark was true of the committee of the House of Representatives. I have corrected it so far as relates to the Senate committee.

Mr. CONNESS. The difference to which the Senator called the attention of the Senate between the two modes of granting land for the construction of railroads, is this: on the one hand, the land is granted to the State for the company, to be disposed of by the State for the company; the disposition of the land, after the grant is made and the act is passed, is entirely under the direction of the State government; while, on the other hand, the plan is to provide that a certain amount of land shall be granted to a company and that the company shall not get an acre of it until the number of miles provided to be constructed by the company shall have been constructed and finished. The difference is, that in the one case the Government keeps within its own hands and possession all the land that it proposes to grant until the road is built correspondingly, and under the other system the Government passes the land to the State, and it is a matter of disposition between the State and the company thereafter. Between the two systems the one is infinitely, as I think, superior to the other. I do not wish, however, and I did not rise to comment upon the system which the Senator seems to have proceeded in accordance with, but to say that his statement in regard to the mode of doing business on the Pacific Railroad Committee is not correct, and is a mistake and an error. I know nothing about this bill.

Mr. POMEROY. I stated that so far as the present Committee on the Pacific Railroad in the Senate is concerned, I did make a mistake. I know I did, but my statement was correct so far as refers to the Committee on the Pacific Railroad of the House of Representatives.

Mr. FESSENDEN. I am very much averse to this kind of a report, and if we suffer such a practice to grow up I do not know where we shall land in the way of legislation. The report itself may be very well for aught I know; the bill reported may be a very much better bill than that which was originally proposed; I dare say it is, if the Senator from Kansas says so. But what is the course that has been adopted? I believe it was adopted once before, but not with my consent or my approbation. The idea that a committee of conference can take a bill upon which there is a disagreement of the two Houses with reference to certain provisions, and redraught it entirely from beginning to end, and put in new provisions that were not in the original bill—

Mr. POMEROY. I will say that there is nothing in this report that was not in one bill or the other. Every word of it was either in the House bill or the Senate bill.

Mr. FESSENDEN. "One bill or the other?" I take it we did not pass two bills. Did we pass two bills on the same subject?

Mr. POMEROY. The Senate passed one bill and the House sent back another bill as a substitute for it. We disagreed to that amendment, and then both went to a committee of conference.

Mr. FESSENDEN. Then two separate bills in point of fact passed the different branches and were sent to a committee of conference, and the committee of conference have undertaken to draw a new bill. I think the practice is a very loose one. It leads to the adoption of provisions which neither House has ever had an opportunity to pass upon. That is the result.

Mr. POMEROY. It may result in that way sometimes; but in this particular instance every provision in this bill has been in one or the other bills.

Mr. FESSENDEN. That we do not know anything about until we see what is in it. It comes in here as the report of a committee of conference, and we have to take it as a whole. We have never discussed the bill of the House. It came here as a separate and independent bill, and it was not discussed or examined here, but was simply disagreed to and sent to a committee of conference. The result of this course is that the legislation of Congress passes entirely into the hands of a committee of conference. In the committees of conference of which I have been a member I have always been opposed to this course of proceeding, and I have succeeded in keeping off new matter which had not been considered by either branch. It may be that this report is all right. I have great confidence in the judgment of my friend from Kansas about the bill itself. It may be a good one and well guarded, but the practice is a very bad one. I am averse, therefore, to agreeing to this report of the committee of conference, and I think it ought not to be agreed to on the part of the Senate until the Senate have had an opportunity to compare it with the bills that were sent to the committee and see that there is nothing in it that was not contained in one or the other. For that reason I hope the Senator will consent that the report may be printed, in order that it may be compared with the other bills.

Mr. POMEROY. I certainly have no objection to that course. I agree with what the Senator has said in many respects; but I have found out that when he has made a report from a committee of conference, it has been generally that the Senate recede from one amendment and the House adopt another, numbered so and so, so that I am entirely at a loss to know how the bill stands when he gets through. If he would report exactly what the committee did agree to, I should always know then.

Mr. FESSENDEN. When I make a report, I always add to it that I am perfectly ready to answer any question with regard to the different parts of the report that any Senator desires to ask or explain the whole matter and state the differences.

Mr. POMEROY. I am perfectly willing to answer any question the Senator may desire to ask about this bill. If I am any judge of the matter, it is the best bill we have ever been able to report to either House.

Mr. FESSENDEN. I dare say it is; but if it were to be as good as could be put down by the recording angel, and he drew it, the practice is a bad one, and it would still be equally objectionable.

Mr. POMEROY. Both bills have been very thoroughly examined in the two Houses. I have no objection to any delay the Senator may desire; if he wants a postponement until Monday, be it so.

Mr. FESSENDEN. I think the report had better lie over and be printed.

Mr. CONNESS. It is printed now.

Mr. POMEROY. It is all in print; there is no new matter.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Does the Senator from Maine move to print the report?

Mr. FESSENDEN. Not if it is already printed. I move to postpone it until Monday.

The motion was agreed to.

APPROVAL OF BILLS.

A message from the President of the United States, by Mr. EDMUND COOPER, his Secretary, announced that he had, on the 13th instant, approved and signed an act (S. No. 125) granting aid in the construction of a railroad and telegraph line from the town of Folsom to the town of Placerville, in California; and an act (S. No. 221) relating to lands granted to the State of Minnesota, to aid in constructing railroads; and on the 14th instant, a joint resolution (S. R. No. 129) to authorize the President to place at the disposal of the authorities of Portland, Maine, tents, camp and hospital furniture, and clothing for the use of families rendered houseless by the late fire.

EXECUTIVE SESSION.

Mr. WILLIAMS. Under the circumstances, in view of the uncomfortableness of the room to-day, I move that the Senate proceed to the consideration of executive business.

Mr. WADE. I hope not. I have been trying to get the floor for some time in order to call up the bill equalizing the salaries of the employés of the Senate and House, but I have been unable to get the floor latterly. It is early to go into executive session now, and I hope we shall not do it.

The motion was agreed to; and after some time spent in executive session the doors were reopened, and the Senate adjourned.

HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES.

SATURDAY, July 14, 1866.

The House met at twelve o'clock m. Prayer by the Chaplain, Rev. C. B. BOYNTON.

The Journal of yesterday was read and approved.

ASSAULT UPON A MEMBER.

The SPEAKER. The first business in order is the consideration of the question of privilege pending at the adjournment yesterday. The gentleman from Ohio [Mr. SPALDING] is entitled to the floor.

Mr. SPALDING. I move that the further consideration of this question be postponed till the expiration of the morning hour.

The motion was agreed to.

BRIG RESOLUTE.

Mr. ELIOT. I ask leave to withdraw from the files of the House certain papers belonging to the owners of the brig Resolute, which were referred to the Committee on Commerce, and are now wanted at the Treasury Department. Leave was granted.

BRIDGE ACROSS THE MISSISSIPPI.

The SPEAKER. The first business in order during the morning hour is the consideration of the bill reported from the Committee on the Post Office and Post Roads by the gentleman from Massachusetts [Mr. ALLEY]—the bill (S. No. 286) to authorize the construction of certain bridges and to reestablish them as post roads. The pending question is upon agreeing to the amendment of the committee as amended by the House.

Mr. ALLISON. The gentleman from Massachusetts yields to me that I may offer as an amendment to the amendment the following, to come in as a new section:

And be it further enacted, That a bridge may be constructed and maintained across the Mississippi river, between Dunleith, in the State of Illinois, and Dubuque, in the State of Iowa, with the consent of said States previously given or hereafter acquired, with the same privileges, upon the same terms, and under the same restrictions as are contained in this act for the construction of a bridge at Quincy, Illinois.

On this amendment I demand the previous question.

The previous question was seconded and the main question ordered; and under the operation thereof the amendment to the amendment was agreed to.

Mr. ALLEY. I yield the floor to the gentleman from Missouri.

Mr. VAN HORN, of Missouri. I submit the following amendment to the amendment, and demand the previous question on its adoption:

And be it further enacted, That any company authorized by the Legislature of Missouri may construct a bridge across the Missouri river at the city of Kansas, upon the same terms and conditions provided for in this act.

The previous question was seconded and the main question ordered; and under the operation thereof the amendment to the amendment was agreed to.

Mr. VAN HORN, of Missouri, moved to reconsider the vote by which the last two amendments to the amendment were agreed to; and also moved that the motion to reconsider be laid upon the table.

The latter motion was agreed to.

Mr. ALLEY. I now move the following amendment to the amendment:

And be it further enacted, That the bridge constructed over the Mississippi river at Clinton, Iowa, by the Albany Bridge Company, under authority of the States of Illinois and Iowa, be, and the same is hereby, declared to be a post route and highway of the United States, and may be maintained, provided it does not materially obstruct the navigation of said river.

Mr. WASHBURN, of Illinois. I ask the gentleman to let me present the following modification:

Provided, That nothing in this section shall in anywise interfere with any lawsuits now pending in any court in regard to the said bridge, and this section of this act shall not take effect until the said bridge shall be made to conform in width of draw and all other respects to what is required to be done in reference to all the bridges referred to in this act.

Mr. ALLEY. I decline to accept that as a modification of my amendment.

Mr. Speaker, this matter was originally referred to the committee, and after hearing all parties in interest, upon a full and thorough investigation it was unanimously decided, I believe with a single exception—I am not certain they did not all agree—that I should report this as an original independent bill to the House. Not having had an opportunity to do so, I report it as an additional section to this bill.

This is a bridge already built, but differing in some particulars from the bridges it is proposed to build by the bill now before the House. It has a draw of only one hundred and twenty feet, while the width of the draws of the bridges proposed to be built under the bill before the House is to be one hundred and sixty feet. This is the only difference so far as any important particular is concerned. Now, as this rests upon a different principle from the other bridges, I propose to consider it separately, and therefore have offered it as an additional section. I propose to give the gentlemen who are opposed to it an opportunity to give their views on this section.

The erection of these bridges involves interests of vast magnitude, not only to the people of the Northwest, but to nearly all the citizens of this widely-extended country. So important has it become to extend and increase our facilities of transportation across as well as upon navigable streams, that all are compelled to concede what was once disputed, the complete jurisdiction of Congress over this matter. No one contends, either, that it is possible to meet the demands of a constantly increasing inland commerce under our present railway system much longer without the erection of many bridges over the "Father of Waters." The constitutional objection being surrendered, and the necessities of the public admitted, that bridging of some kind is needed and must be had, it only remains to determine what kind of bridges you will authorize the erection of. That, and that only, is the point in issue at the present time.

As I said when I offered the amendment, this bridge occupies a position different from the others. It is already built, and it appears from the testimony before the committee that it is substantially built of the best materials, and at the best point between St. Louis and St. Paul, interfering little, if any, with the navigation of the river. It is guarded at all points. It is provided that it shall not materially obstruct the navigation of the river. Under the circumstances I hope the House will sanction the action of the committee and pass the bill. I will now yield ten minutes of my time to the gentleman from Missouri, [Mr. HOGAN.]

Mr. WASHBURN, of Illinois. I hope the gentleman from Massachusetts will not undertake to put this section of his bill through the House under the gag. I tell the House that it is the most important measure with reference to the people of the Mississippi valley that we have considered this session. It involves the interests of eight million people. This bridge has been already built in defiance of law, and I ask the House to give the people a fair hearing.

Mr. ALLEY. Mr. Speaker, I did not yield the floor to the gentleman from Illinois.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Massachusetts has the floor, and it is for him to say whether he will allow the gentleman from Illinois to proceed.

Mr. ALLEY. The gentleman has better lungs than I have. [Laughter.]

The SPEAKER. The gentleman will state to whom he yields.

Mr. ALLEY. I yield now to the gentleman from Missouri, [Mr. HOGAN,] and I will inform the gentleman from Illinois that I will yield to him presently. I propose to give to the opposition just as much, if not more, time than we have on this side.

Mr. WASHBURN, of Illinois. Now, sir,

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Massachusetts does not yield to the gentleman from Illinois.

Mr. WASHBURN, of Illinois. He said just now that he would.

Mr. ALLEY. But not now.

Mr. WASHBURN, of Illinois. I ask the gentleman to yield for a question.

Mr. ALLEY. Just for a question.

Mr. WASHBURN, of Illinois. I ask the gentleman from Massachusetts, in the spirit of fairness and honor which becomes a legislator, not to undertake to hold the floor and press this section through under the previous question. This matter must necessarily take the remainder of the time allowed to the Committee on the Post Office and Post Roads. We have plenty of time to consider this matter fully and fairly, and I appeal to the judgment, honesty, and fairness of the House to say if they mean to confine the discussion of this, which is one of the most important questions we have had before us, to a single hour.

Mr. ALLEY. I will say, in all fairness to the gentleman from Illinois, that discussion of this bill is the last thing in the world that I shall shrink from. I believe it is a bill which has great merits, and that it can stand on its merits. If it cannot, no man in this House is more willing that it should fall than I am. I would be quite willing to have it discussed the day through, if necessary, but I am under obligation to others, and I cannot consent at this late period of the session to allow much time to be taken in the discussion of the bill. I am willing to give all the time that the House thinks proper, but when I feel that the question has been discussed as much as the House is willing to allow, I shall then call the previous question and take the sense of the House upon it. The House will determine whether I am reasonable or not. With this statement I will now yield to the gentleman from Missouri, [Mr. HOGAN.]

Mr. WASHBURN, of Illinois. I understand the gentleman to say that he will call the previous question, and yield the floor to the gentleman from Missouri and myself at his pleasure. Now, I will not accept the offer of a few minutes at his pleasure, and will throw myself on the generosity of the House.

Mr. ALLEY. It is well known that the gentleman is a great strategist, and I do not think I shall yield the floor to him to take the bill out of my hands and make such disposition of it as he pleases. I intend to yield the floor to give opportunity for reasonable discussion. If I am unreasonable the House has the power to determine it. And I assure the gentleman that not a moment more of the time shall be allowed to the friends of the bill than to its opponents. I now yield to the gentleman from Missouri, [Mr. HOGAN.]

Mr. HOGAN. Mr. Speaker, I must express my wonderful obligations to the gentleman from Massachusetts [Mr. ALLEY] who has extended to me, in behalf of the great navigation interest of the Mississippi, ten minutes to discuss a measure of incalculable importance adverse to that interest—a measure which proposes to allow a chartered monopoly to take the business of the people into their own hands.

The Ordinance of 1787 requires that the Mississippi river and its tributaries shall be forever free and unobstructed to all the people of the United States, and now the gentleman from Massachusetts comes into this House at the bidding of the great monopolies of this country to destroy that navigation, to take away from the people the right that they have, as citizens of the United States, to the free navigation of the greatest river in the world, and I and other gentlemen, perhaps, who are similarly situated are condescendingly allowed ten minutes' time to present these matters.

Now, sir, here is a great measure that stops virtually the navigation of the Mississippi river. It was referred to the Committee on the Post Office and Post Roads, and for months it was discussed there. Gentlemen were brought before the committee; lawyers were employed by the monopolies in order to induce the committee to make a report favorable to them. But at a time when one member of the committee, who was known to be opposed to the measure, was sick, four members of the committee agreed with the other four that the bill might be reported to the House without any recommendation. The committee was fairly divided in regard to it, but they agreed that it might be brought before the House.

Mr. ALLEY. Allow me a word of explanation.

Mr. HOGAN. I will if it does not come out of my ten minutes.

Mr. ALLEY. The section now under discussion was unanimously reported by the committee.

Mr. HOGAN. I would ask the gentleman if the committee authorized it to be put into this omnibus bill.

Mr. ALLEY. They directed me to report the provision precisely as it is here, but not having an opportunity to report it alone I put it into this bill.

Mr. HOGAN. To give it strength I understand that the committee agreed that the measure might be brought into this House for its action. What was the next move? Why, to go around and gather up A, B, and C to put other measures on the bill in order to gain strength enough to force it through Congress. Sir, is that the way in which the rights of the western country are to be legislated away into the possession of monopolies? I say, sir, that this is not the bill that was before the Committee on the Post Office and Post Roads. The gentleman introduced a bill here which was framed by the attorney of this bridge company. It has lain here all this session, and now, at the heel of the session, the gentleman has stuck it on as an amendment to this bill so as to increase the omnibus, and thus, by possibility, pass it through the House.

Sir, I speak to-day in the interest of the people. I have no fee in order to induce my advocacy of the Mississippi river as a medium of commerce for this country. I am not the employed agent or attorney of any of these monopolies. They have their agents here upon this floor; they have their interested stockholders here to vote upon this measure; they have their feed attorneys here to vote upon this measure and rob the people of the West of the great, God-given right to navigate freely the great Mississippi river.

Mr. RANDALL, of Pennsylvania. Allow me a question.

Mr. HOGAN. I have but ten minutes.

Mr. RANDALL, of Pennsylvania. The gentleman says the company has attorneys on this floor; does he mean in seats here?

Mr. HOGAN. In their seats here.

Mr. RANDALL, of Pennsylvania. Who are they?

Mr. HOGAN. I do not choose to give names.

Mr. BOUTWELL. I insist on it as a point of order. The gentleman makes a distinct charge and I ask that his words be taken down at the Clerk's desk.

Mr. HOGAN's remarks as taken down by the reporters of the Globe were read, as follows:

"They have their agents here upon this floor; they have their interested stockholders here to vote upon this measure; they have their feed attorneys here to vote upon this measure and rob the people of the West of the great, God-given right to navigate freely the great Mississippi river."

The SPEAKER. The Chair thinks those words are not in order. They contain a reflection upon members of the House.

Mr. RANDALL, of Pennsylvania. The question is whether they are true. That is the material point.

Mr. HOGAN. I do not wish to say anything improper. I would not have made a solitary reflection upon any one in connection with this matter if an opportunity for deliberate debate had been allowed me.

Mr. BOUTWELL. I think the House, at this stage of the matter, has a right to know whether the gentleman from Missouri stands by the words he has used reflecting on members of the House, or does he retract them?

Mr. HOGAN. As the words are clearly not proper words to be used here, I prefer to withdraw the words I used on that subject. They are clearly not proper, and I say again—

Mr. BOUTWELL. I think the House must follow the gentleman from Missouri [Mr. HOGAN] one step further. It is not sufficient that he should retract the words; I think he must state to the House whether he used the words inadvertently and without authority, or whether he retracts them merely because he does not choose to stand by the reflection upon the members of this House.

Mr. SPALDING. I ask that the objectionable words may be again read.

The Clerk read the words as above recorded.

Mr. THAYER. I think the gentleman from Missouri [Mr. HOGAN] has done everything the House could desire him to do. He has withdrawn the words objected to, and I therefore move that he be allowed to proceed in order.

The SPEAKER. That motion must be taken without debate.

The motion was agreed to.

Mr. HOGAN. Now, Mr. Speaker, I say distinctly if the gentleman from Massachusetts, [Mr. BOUTWELL]—

Mr. BOUTWELL. I would like to know whether the retraction has been taken down; and if so, I ask that it be read to the House.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Missouri [Mr. HOGAN] has been allowed by a vote of the House to proceed in order, and is not to be interrupted while proceeding in order. What he says will be taken down by the reporters of the Globe.

Mr. BANKS. I think the House is entitled to a record of the entire transaction. If words uttered here are excepted to they are written down, and there is a record of them entered upon the Journal of the proceedings of the House. If the member makes a retraction, that retraction ought also to be taken down in writing and be made a part of the Journal of the proceedings of the House.

The SPEAKER. That might be, perhaps; but the rule does not so state. The Chair will decide by the rule. The first part of the sixty-second rule is as follows:

"If a member be called to order for words spoken in debate, the person calling him to order shall repeat the words excepted to, and they shall be taken down in writing at the Clerk's table."

The latter part of the sixty-first rule is as follows:

"If the decision be in favor of the member called to order, he shall be at liberty to proceed; if otherwise, he shall not be permitted to proceed, in case any member object, without leave of the House."

The gentleman from Massachusetts [Mr. BOUTWELL] objected to the member from Missouri [Mr. HOGAN] proceeding. The gentleman from Pennsylvania [Mr. THAYER] moved that the gentleman from Missouri be allowed to proceed in order. The majority of the House voted that the gentleman be allowed to proceed in order. Only the words excepted to are required to be taken down in writing, not the retraction.

Mr. ASHLEY, of Ohio. I understood the gentleman from Missouri to say that these attorneys were in their seats here.

The SPEAKER. The House has passed from that subject now, and the gentleman from Missouri [Mr. HOGAN] has the permission of the House to proceed in order.

Mr. ASHLEY, of Ohio. I move to reconsider the vote by which the gentleman from Missouri [Mr. HOGAN] was allowed to proceed in order.

Mr. GRIDER. Upon that motion I call for the yeas and nays.

Mr. BROMWELL. I move to lay the motion to reconsider upon the table.

Mr. GRIDER. Upon that motion I call for the yeas and nays.

The yeas and nays were not ordered.

The motion to reconsider was then laid on the table.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Missouri [Mr. HOGAN] is entitled to the floor for three minutes, unless another point of order is made, as he has the authority of the House to proceed in order.

Mr. HOGAN. Mr. Speaker, I will take part of my three minutes now to say—and I wish what I say to be taken down distinctly—that the remarks I made were improper. They should not have been made, and would not have been made, but that I felt that it was great provocation, on a great question like this, in which the people of my district and other parts of the West are so vitally interested, to be allowed only ten minutes to speak upon it, while other parties could have almost all the time they wanted. Now, I will say in reference to this matter—

Mr. ALLEY. Will the gentleman from Missouri yield to me a moment for a question?

Mr. HOGAN. Will this interruption come out of my time? If I could have time I would have no objection to answer all the questions that could be asked.

Mr. ALLEY. I wish to ask the gentleman from Missouri whether I did not go to him and tell him what I proposed to do and the circumstances under which I was placed, promising to give him ten minutes to speak upon this particular section, and that, if he desired it, after the previous question had been called and sustained, I would give him some additional time to speak upon the general merits of the bill. I understood the gentleman to express himself as perfectly satisfied with the arrangement; and certainly nothing has astonished me more than to hear the complaint which he makes this morning.

Mr. HOGAN. On that subject there must be some misunderstanding between the gentleman and myself. His proposition, as I understood it, was that if the Clinton bridge should not be put into the omnibus bill, then I could have ten minutes to speak upon the general merits of the whole bill. But the understanding which I had was that this Clinton bridge bill was to remain upon its merits as a separate measure. That was the way I understood it.

Mr. ALLEY. The gentleman will remember that previously to my asking the gentleman whether he would not consent, if this was not put into the bill, to go for the other, I called upon him in reference to that arrangement. I told him the reason why I was compelled to put it into this bill, because I could not get it in as a separate bill.

The SPEAKER. The ten minutes of the gentleman from Missouri have expired.

Mr. ALLEY. I yield five minutes more to the gentleman from Missouri.

Mr. HOGAN. Mr. Speaker, it is a remarkable stretch of magnanimity to allow to an advocate of the unobstructed navigation of the Mississippi river five minutes to reply to efforts in behalf of chartered monopolies to destroy its navigation. Dogentlemen of this House know the magnitude of the business of the Mississippi river? Let me call their attention to the fact that in the year 1865 the enrolled carrying capacity of the steamers on the Mississippi and its tributaries was two hundred and ninety-two thousand one hundred and forty-four tons, there being nine hundred and ten steamers engaged in the navigation of that river. And those nine hundred and ten steamers have cost the people who have built them $30,000,000. And dogentlemen know that the commerce of that Mississippi river, if left undisturbed by the power of moneyed monopolies endeavoring to destroy it, is equal to the whole foreign commerce of the United States?

It is not only the States bordering upon the river that are interested in this commerce. There are eleven States that could find outlets to market through that medium if left undisturbed by the monopolizing railroads. But it is not only those States that are interested. Gentlemen from Maine are as much interested in the free navigation of the Mississippi river as my constituents are. If the people of Maine are buying from the West six hundred thousand barrels of flour every year, let me assure them that they can transport that flour from the falls of St. Anthony, at the extreme upper part of the navigation of the river, to Portland, Maine, for one dollar or one dollar and a half less per barrel than they can transport it by any railroads now existing in the country. Every year nearly a million dollars is taken out of the pockets of the people of Maine for breadstuffs alone, in the shape of flour, to be put into the pockets of monopolizing railroad companies, who are seeking to destroy the navigation of that great river. I am not opposed to bridges. I have no opposition to bridges. I hope the Mississippi river may be bridged at every mile if that be wanted to be done. I have no objection as to how many bridges are constructed; but why shall you give the right to obstruct the navigation of that river to the railroad companies and prevent thereby the free transit of these commodities through that channel to the markets of the world?

These companies can construct bridges that will not obstruct the navigation of that river. It will cost a little more money to do it. I ask this Congress, members of all parties, whether they are going to disturb the interests of the people of the western country in the navigation of this river in order to save money to these few railroad kings who have grown up and fattened upon the spoils they have gathered from the people. If they would carry freight at fair rates I would have no objection to their bridging the Mississippi river. If they will build bridges so as not to obstruct the navigation of the river, I have no objection.

The Supreme Court has said, and Congress has enacted, that for the Ohio river a bridge must be fifty feet above high-water mark. Why should it not be so for the Mississippi river?

The SPEAKER. The gentleman's time has expired.

Mr. HOGAN. Are not those great interests to be fully heard?

Mr. ALLEY. I decline to yield further.

Mr. HOGAN. No, sir; these monopolies are too strong.

Mr. WASHBURNE, of Illinois. I rise to a question of order. Will not this continue to be the business of the morning hour till disposed of?

The SPEAKER. It will.

Mr. WASHBURNE, of Illinois. This is the most important question to my constituents before this Congress, and crowding me into a few minutes to make a speech showing all the facts, when there is no necessity for it, has never before been done within my knowledge or experience.

Mr. ALLEY. Am I to understand this will continue to be the pending business in the morning hour until disposed of?

The SPEAKER. No other committee can report till this bill has been disposed of. The next morning hour will be on Tuesday next.

Mr. WASHBURNE, of Illinois. This bill is before the House and is bound to be disposed of. It cannot be got rid of. If it were otherwise I would not ask the gentleman to yield to me.

Mr. ALLEY. I will yield to the gentleman for ten minutes.

Mr. WASHBURNE, of Illinois. I cannot accept that. If the House be determined to strike in this way, it must strike without my being heard at all. I am not willing to be limited to ten minutes in which to explain how this matter stands. It is something which has never been tolerated during my service here.

Mr. INGERSOLL. I rise to a point of order. Does not the next morning hour come on next Tuesday?

The SPEAKER. It will, unless interrupted by a question of privilege.

Mr. WASHBURNE, of Illinois. Will not this be the continuous business of the morning hour until disposed of?

The SPEAKER. It will, if not interrupted by questions of privilege.

Mr. INGERSOLL. And the reports of the other committees will be kept back.

Mr. ALLEY. I desire to be entirely fair, and to give everybody an opportunity to discuss the bill to their heart's content. No one intimated a desire to discuss it except the gentleman from Missouri and the gentleman from Illinois, and I thought I had made an arrangement with which they were satisfied. I give to the gentleman from Illinois ten minutes now, and will again yield to him after the previous question has been ordered to speak generally upon the bill.

Mr. WASHBURNE, of Illinois. I want to speak to this amendment. I expect to vote for the bill if this amendment be voted down.

Mr. ALLEY. It seems to me the gentleman ought to be able to explain his position in ten minutes.

Mr. WASHBURNE, of Illinois. The gentleman may be enabled to, but I tell the House that it is impossible for me to state all the facts. The evidence amounts to several pages, giving all the facts in relation to the obstruction of navigation by that bridge.

Mr. ALLEY. If the gentleman will allow me, I will say there is but one particular point in the matter, and that he can speak to in ten minutes. Indeed, I think five minutes is sufficient time, with his ability, to state the grounds of his opposition to this amendment, upon the only point which he can raise after the declaration he has made, that he is in favor of the general bill; for it differs from the general bill only in this particular, that the draw is a little narrower. Now, I can show that it is a great deal wider than any draw in the world was twenty years ago, and I do not know of but one draw in the world at the present time that is equal to it in width. I think there are other reasons which I can give for the gentleman's opposition which will explain it entirely, and if he chooses to take the ten minutes I do not want more than five minutes for reply.

Mr. WASHBURNE, of Illinois. I do not accept the ten minutes. The House, I trust, will allow me more time.

The SPEAKER. Then the gentleman from Massachusetts is entitled to the floor.

Mr. ALLEY. Then I will only say a very few words in reply to the gentleman from Missouri, [Mr. HOGAN.] I think his argument was more to the merits of the general bill than it was to this specific proposition. As I observed before, the only difference between this bridge and the bridges that it is proposed to build is in its width. I believe in all other particulars the provision is precisely like the others.

This bridge has been built and in operation eighteen months. It is one of the most substantial character, built in the best possible manner. The width of the draw in the clear is one hundred and twenty feet, and those who know anything about draw-bridges know that that is ample. As I said before, it is wider than any draw in 1841.

Mr. HOGAN. Will the gentleman allow me a question?

Mr. ALLEY. Yes, sir.

Mr. HOGAN. Does the gentleman know anything at all of the character of the navigating interest of the Mississippi river? Does he know that the steamers have barges in tow, so that one hundred and twenty feet is not a sufficient width at all?

Mr. ALLEY. I will state that we have ample and complete testimony upon all these points by the navigators, by parties interested on both sides, by everybody that desired to say anything about it, and after listening to all the testimony, hearing all the facts, and examining them very carefully for a great length of time, we came to the conclusion, I think unanimously, or at any rate with one single exception, that the draw was ample, and that there was no force in the objection that was made. And now all this company asks, after having the authority from the States of Illinois and Missouri to build the bridge, is simply that it be declared a post route. That is the whole sum and substance of the proposition. And can the House refuse, after granting all these privileges to all these other companies, to allow this amendment to be adopted? And now let me say one word further with regard to the opposition of the gentleman from Missouri and the gentleman from Illinois. I cannot see why in the world they make so much objection to this particular proposition, when the only difference is in the draw, except that this objection occurs to my mind—and I throw it out for the benefit of the House, and they may attach such weight to it as they choose. There is a great rivalry between the cities of St. Louis and Chicago. I think no member of the House will fail to see it. This bridge affects somewhat injuriously, perhaps, the interests of the city of St. Louis.

Mr. HOGAN. I desire to ask the gentleman another question. If this bridge at Clinton is no obstruction to navigation, how can it possibly interfere with the business interests of Missouri?

Mr. ALLEY. A great spirit of rivalry exists between St. Louis and Chicago, and the city of Chicago is benefited somewhat by these additional facilities, and while it promotes the business interest of Chicago it does not take much of anything from the city of St. Louis, but being a rival city it excites jealousy and hostility. And with regard to the gentleman from Illinois, [Mr. WASHBURNE,] his city of Galena is somewhat in the same predicament. Now, anybody who has been in the House as long as I have with the gentleman from Illinois knows very well that any bill that does not bring any toll to his mill—and by his mill I mean the city of Galena—never receives much favor at his hands. I must confess that I am unable to see any serious objection that he can possibly make to this bill that does not exist against the general bill except it be the fact that Galena is not benefited by it.

Mr. WASHBURNE, of Illinois. I call the gentleman to order, and require that his words be taken down.

The words of Mr. ALLEY excepted to by Mr. WASHBURNE, of Illinois, as taken down by the reporters of the Globe, were read, as follows:

"Now, anybody who has been in the House as long as I have with the gentleman from Illinois, knows very well that any bill that does not bring any toll to his mill—and by his mill I mean the city of Galena—never receives much favor at his hands."

Mr. ASHLEY, of Ohio. I would like to ask the gentleman from Illinois if he calls the gentleman from Massachusetts to order because he has designated the city of Galena a mill. [Laughter.]

The SPEAKER. The Chair overrules the point of order made by the gentleman from Illinois, [Mr. WASHBURNE.]

Mr. WASHBURNE, of Illinois. I desire to be heard in regard to this matter.

The SPEAKER. It is not debatable. The gentleman from Massachusetts [Mr. ALLEY] will proceed.

Mr. WASHBURN, of Illinois. I now ask in consideration of what has been stated by the gentleman from Massachusetts—

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Massachusetts [Mr. ALLEY] is entitled to the floor unless he yields. He must state whether he does yield or does not.

Mr. ALLEY. I do not.

The SPEAKER. Then the gentleman will proceed with his remarks.

Mr. ALLEY. I was going on to remark that so far as the gentleman from Illinois is concerned, I understand what his purpose is. He wants to use up the morning hour. I now call the previous question.

Mr. WASHBURN, of Illinois. I appeal to the House to hear me in response to the gentleman from Massachusetts.

The SPEAKER. Does the gentleman call the previous question on the amendment or on the whole bill?

Mr. ALLEY. On the whole bill. I have given the gentleman all the opportunity to be heard that I agreed to do, and I cannot consent to give him any more. I must insist on the previous question.

The question was put upon seconding the demand for the previous question; and there were—ayes 46, noes 42; no quorum voting.

Mr. WASHBURN, of Illinois. I hope the gentleman will withdraw the demand for the previous question.

Mr. INGERSOLL. I hope the previous question will be seconded.

Mr. ALLEY. I will give the gentleman from Illinois [Mr. WASHBURN] thirty minutes of my time after the previous question has been seconded.

The previous question was seconded and the main question ordered.

Mr. ALLEY. I now yield to the gentleman from Illinois [Mr. WASHBURN] for thirty minutes.

Mr. WASHBURN, of Illinois. Mr. Speaker, I wish in the first place to thank the House for coming so near to defeating the previous question as to secure to me the agreement that I may speak for half an hour. The members of this House have undoubtedly understood something of the interest I feel on this subject of bridges. And I ask the indulgence of the House while I state in a few words the reasons why I have felt so much interest in this question of damming up by bridging that magnificent and majestic highway of commerce which has been dedicated to the free intercourse of the commerce of the country. In the first place, without the authority of Congress, a bridge was built at Rock Island many years ago; and let me tell the House, what is the fact, and what has been proved by the record: that bridge has been a damage of $5,000,000 to the commerce of the country. From the time the bridge was built in 1855, down to 1859, there were not less than sixty-four steamboats lost, wrecked, or damaged, worth in the aggregate $2,000,000, and the sum of $3,000,000 may have been added as a tax upon the commerce of the country by the additional rates of freight and insurance, owing to the dangers to navigation which that bridge has caused. But because there was a question of jurisdiction arising, as well as other questions, the people who have suffered this great injury have been without remedy, although this vast amount of damage has accrued to them.

Now I wish to direct the attention of this House briefly and hurriedly to this matter, as it now comes before us, for I feel that I am tied down here to a sort of bed of Procrustes, to one half hour. I desire to call the attention of the members to the enormity of this bill which has been brought in here. Notwithstanding the effect of this Rock Island bridge, another bridge was built at Clinton, which is the bridge it is now sought to legalize by this bill. Now, I say to you, Mr. Speaker, and I say to this House, that if I cannot demonstrate that this is one of the most impudent and one of the most outrageous measures that this House was ever called upon to sanction, then I will give up the argument. Now, sir, what is this whole matter? I ask the gentleman from Massachusetts [Mr. ALLEY] to explain it. Here is a bridge built without authority of law, which is a great obstruction to the navigation of the Mississippi river, and which has caused the loss of vast sums of money to the people of the country. And we can have no adequate and speedy remedy for this great wrong on account of questions of jurisdiction and other questions, although there are suits now pending against the owners of the bridge. And yet this railroad interest, these monopolies that my friend from Missouri [Mr. HOGAN] has spoken of, come here and demand of us that we shall sanction this outrage, give it legal validity, and enable them as a part of a system to obtain millions and millions of dollars from the pockets of the people, not only from the pockets of the people of the West but the people of the East.

And how will my friend from Massachusetts [Mr. ALLEY] excuse himself to his constituents for coming here and urging upon us the legalization of this great obstruction to the navigation of the Mississippi river, impeding commerce and adding to the cost of transportation? What is the interest which he can have to dam up this river and add to the expense of living to his constituents? Do not we feed his constituents? Do not the cod-fishers at Marblehead, the clam-diggers at Danvers, and the shoemakers at Lynn, eat our flour and our pork? And does he not well know if you dam up or impede the navigation of this Mississippi river you add to the cost of transportation on these articles and take so much more money out of the pockets of his constituents? If I had the time I could show you by statistics here the additional cost of these things to the people of Massachusetts and all New England to whom we furnish them. Now, let me tell gentlemen that it is in the interest of the railroad companies that the Mississippi should be dammed up, for they want to make all the commerce of the country tributary to them. If they can get permission to dam up that majestic stream they will put whatever price they please upon the transportation of what you get. I have the statistics here showing that since the Mississippi river has become open and free, the price of freight on flour from the upper Mississippi to Boston or New York has come down from one to two dollars a barrel, and yet the gentleman from Massachusetts [Mr. ALLEY] comes here and asks us to legalize the erection of this bridge and thus inflict this additional cost upon his constituents. Why does he want to inflict this injury upon them to benefit railroad monopolies?

Mr. Speaker, this is not the question which is involved in the other sections of the bill. No, sir; I said before in this House that I will not oppose but am rather in favor of bridging the river, if it can be done without obstructing the navigation. Now, sir, let us see what the gentleman from Massachusetts does, and how he stands here before the House in regard to this matter. Sir, what is required by these amendments which the gentleman has introduced, and which were passed upon by the House? Sir, they require a draw of one hundred and sixty feet; and the piers are to be set in a particular way and the draw to be kept open. That, sir, is what the gentleman's committee said was right and proper; and after the committee have made that the rule for all other bridges, the gentleman comes in here and proposes that this bridge shall be made an exception to the general rule. What is his excuse? If a draw one hundred and twenty feet in width is enough, why did the gentleman require a draw one hundred and sixty feet in these other cases? Now, if the House wants to hear the testimony in regard to the obstruction of this bridge, I will read it. Pleading here the cause of the people, I ask them, if they must strike, to hear me. The monopolies are heard; but I ask you to hear the great voice of the people. I did not know that you would hear. I did not know but that you would be worse than the judge of the old mythology, Rhadamanthus, who was regarded as the most inexorable of all the infernal judges. He chastised, but he heard—castigat, auditque. You undertake to chastise, without hearing, my people and the eight million people in the Northwest, besides the gentleman's constituents and the people of the East.

I desire, Mr. Speaker, that this House shall, in considering this Clinton bridge, separate this amendment from the bill which is before the House. Here the gentleman from Massachusetts, after having got through a general bill, undertakes in the interest of a corporation to get through a special bill to legalize this bridge—a thing that has never before been done in this House in regard to a Mississippi river bridge, and which I supposed never could be done or would be done. And, sir, I wish members could realize the terror of the people in the Northwest in regard to what this Congress may do on these subjects. They have felt a keen solicitude with regard to what blow might be struck at their great interests. Sir, the people from one end of the river to the other have been deeply aroused in relation to this subject. Every navigating interest of the Ohio, the Illinois, the Missouri, and the Mississippi, every interest of New England, every interest of New York city and of Philadelphia, the whole commercial interest of the country is concerned in this question.

Now, sir, the gentleman from Massachusetts has the coolness to tell this House that this bridge with a draw only one hundred and twenty feet wide is no obstruction to the navigation, while in the bill before us it is declared, and he declares in reporting it, that a draw of one hundred and sixty feet is necessary.

Mr. WILLIAMS. Does not the gentleman overstate the width of the span of Clinton bridge? I have always understood, and my information has been received from parties familiar with the matter, that it is only one hundred and sixteen feet.

Mr. WASHBURN, of Illinois. It is one hundred and twenty feet. I have all the testimony here. It is forty feet less than the width which the gentleman from Massachusetts has said is necessary for these other bridges. I demand, why this discrimination in favor of this bridge? I have here the testimony of some fifty or sixty pilots and rivermen on the Mississippi river. I do not know that the testimony of the courageous, skillful, hardy men who navigate our commerce upon that river will receive any consideration from this House. But these men are in a position above all other men to know the truth in reference to this matter. What do they tell you? In the first place, they tell you that there is a suit pending in regard to this bridge. I proposed an amendment providing that this legislation should not interfere with any suit in court. This was objected to by the gentleman from Massachusetts. Have you ever, gentlemen of the House of Representatives, voted to take a suit out of court as this bill will do? Then I proposed to the gentleman to withdraw all my opposition to the bill and to vote for it, if he would accept an amendment providing that this bridge should be made to conform precisely to the other bridges before it should be declared a post route. Was not that fair? Was not that just? But the gentleman must have the "pound of flesh." He demands of us everything that we have. Nothing less will satisfy his insatiable desire to be revenged on the West that feeds his constituents. Does he want them to starve? The men interested in the navigation of this river say in their statement that—

"Said bridge is a dangerous nuisance, materially obstructing the navigation of the Mississippi river; that we respectfully pray and hope that Congress will in no manner interfere with the course of justice by legalizing this bridge."

Here, then, is the sworn testimony. We have the affidavit of some fifteen or twenty more pilots, and I ask the attention of the House to their declarations:

"The undersigned, pilots, captains, and experts in the navigation of the upper Mississippi river, and owners of boats engaged in the navigation of the upper Mississippi river, being duly sworn, state on oath, that they believe the bridge across the Mississippi river at Clinton, Iowa, as at present constructed, is a very material obstruction to the navigation of the Mississippi river: that they each and all have had experience in the navigation through the draw of said bridge and speak from actual experience and knowledge: that the same causes great risk to life and property in passing through the same, and causes great delay and loss to owners by detention on account of wind or darkness at times when but for the bridge that portion of the river could be run with perfect ease and safety; that the said bridge is located where there is a curve in the river, and the piers are set at an angle of from ten to fifteen degrees to the current, causing great difficulty in the approach to the draw, and danger of collision; that the draw is only one hundred and twenty feet in width, and the difficulty is greatly increased when boats have barges in tow."

It is known to us in the West, although it may not be known to the members from the East, that we can carry grain better and cheaper in these barges on the Mississippi river.

"That the average width of a large boat, including guards, is nearly sixty feet, and the additional width of two barges would be about fifty feet more, so that only ten feet margin, or five feet on each side, is allowed. That where there is a current this margin is entirely too small for safe navigation, even in calm weather; and when there is any wind, or it is dark, the danger is greatly enhanced."

Will gentlemen sanction this? Will gentlemen sanction a bill of this kind? Will they say that this shall be a post route and there is to be no remedy in all time for the suffering people? Are we to be tied up forever? Are we to be made tributary to these railroad companies? I say no; and I call upon the House to place the seal of its condemnation upon this matter. The moment you strike at the free navigation of the Mississippi river you strike a deadly blow at every farmer in the Northwest.

How was it in regard to the Rock Island bridge? Although we had no remedy for want of jurisdiction, still it was such a nuisance that its friends finally gave it up. What has this House done? This House has passed an act at this session so that this bridge may be removed. We then hoped, when that great curse and obstruction was removed, we should be able to get this Clinton bridge removed or changed, so as not so greatly to obstruct navigation; but here comes a proposition to legalize this bridge and make it an eternal nuisance.

But does the House know another thing? After the Senate had passed upon this question of bridges, and after it was discussed there for days while we are cut down to half an hour; after they discussed it and passed the bill before the House, what did the Senate do? In the river and harbor bill they placed the following which we adopted, and it has since become the law of the land:

"Sec. 4. And be it further enacted, That the Secretary of War is hereby directed to cause examinations or surveys, or both, as aforesaid, to be made at the following points, namely: of the Mississippi river, between Fort Snelling and the falls of St. Anthony and the upper or Rock river rapids of the Mississippi river, with a view to ascertain the most feasible means, by economizing the water of the stream, of insuring the passage, at all navigable seasons, of boats drawing four feet of water; of the Minnesota river, from its mouth to the Yellow Medicine river, in order to ascertain the practicability and expense, by slack-water navigation or otherwise, of securing the continued navigability of said stream during the usual season of navigation, and for examining and reporting upon the subject of constructing railroad bridges across the Mississippi river, between St. Paul, in Minnesota, and St. Louis, in the State of Missouri, upon such plans of construction as will offer the least impediment to the navigation of the river."

That is what the Senate did. Believing nothing should be done without official examination, they put in that amendment, and we have adopted it, and it is now the law of the land.

Mr. DRIGGS. I ask the gentleman whether in his statement that sixty steamers and two millions of property had been lost on the river, he meant to say that these losses were on account of these boats coming in contact with the bridge, and whether the losses would have occurred had it not been for the bridge. As the gentleman did not make this point clear, I hope he will answer the question.

Mr. WASHBURN, of Illinois. I said we have evidence that sixty-four steamboats were lost, wrecked, or injured by this bridge, and that the value of that property was estimated at $2,000,000. One steamboat lost there was worth $200,000—one of the most beautiful boats that ever floated on our waters. The Gray Eagle, the pride of the upper Mississippi, commanded by a friend and neighbor, Captain Smith Harris, the most skillful pilot on the river, going out full loaded with freight and passengers, ran against the pier and went down and all was lost. And not only has this vast amount of property been lost, but a great many lives have been lost also, as well as vast amounts of lumber.

Mr. PRICE. Mr. Speaker, my constituents will think it strange if I sit here and listen to the statement that sixty-four steamboats have been lost without making some reply. Now, I have lived in sight of the bridge, and see it every day, and there never have been but three boats lost there during the last season, one burned and two sunk. One of those sunk was the Gray Eagle, and another a small boat. This is news to all the people that live there.

Mr. WASHBURN, of Illinois. It may be news to the gentleman from Iowa, but it is not news to the commissioners that examined the matter. I have the book here.

Mr. PRICE. It may be in the book but not in the river.

Mr. WASHBURN, of Illinois. The book shows that sixty-four steamers and a large number of rafts were lost, wrecked, or damaged. This is a communication addressed to the Secretary of War by members of the House from the West, upon which he ordered the survey of the Rock Island bridge, which it is alleged is no greater obstruction to navigation than the Clinton bridge. One of the commissioners was Captain (now General) Humphreys, Captain (now General) Meade, and Captain (now General) Franklin. After applying certain principles to this examination they say:

"The board is constrained with extreme regret to report that all of these have been violated, thus rendering the bridge not only an obstruction to the navigation of the river, but one materially greater than there was any occasion for."

That is the testimony of these engineers, and is it not to be received here?

The gentleman from Massachusetts [Mr. ALLEY] has undertaken to tell me a great deal about this bridge. It is within sixty miles of where I have lived for more than twenty-six years, and among a people that I have always known, and there is not a day in the year that it is not a subject of conversation among them. Every steamboat man, every merchant, every lumberman talks of it. My friend from Minnesota [Mr. WINDOM] intimates that he is going to vote for this proposition of the gentleman from Massachusetts to dam up the Mississippi. If he do, I hope he will have a happy time with his constituents. I undertake to say it will add two cents to every bushel of wheat shipped from his State in the cost, and an additional freight and rate of insurances besides. And I would like to call his attention to something his own people have done in this matter of the free navigation of the great Father of Waters.

Mr. HUBBARD, of New York. I would like to ask the gentleman to state the number of accidents that have occurred there.

Mr. WASHBURN, of Illinois. I know there have been innumerable accidents there, and great damage done in various ways. I know the testimony is that this bridge is about the same kind of obstruction as the Rock Island bridge. Why, sir, you have made appropriations of hundreds of thousands of dollars to improve the rapids of the Mississippi. There is no person interested in navigation on the Mississippi who will not tell you that these bridges have been infinitely more damage to commerce than those rapids ever were from the beginning of navigation of the river. In the river and harbor bill you appropriated $300,000 to improve the rapids, and now it is proposed to impede the navigation of the river, as you must do most effectually by this bill. If you do I would ask the House to repeal that clause of the river and harbor bill, for the appropriation will do no good.

Mr. HUBBARD, of New York. Will the gentleman yield for a question?

Mr. WASHBURN, of Illinois. It is unreasonable for the gentleman to ask me to yield. He is on the Committee on the Post Office and Post Roads. I have been obliged to run over this subject very hurriedly. I have spoken very rapidly and disconnectedly, but with earnestness, because I feel in earnest. I have no interest in steamboat stocks or railroad stocks or any other stocks. I have very little interest anywhere except once in awhile when I see a deadly blow being struck at the people to whom I owe everything that I am—if I am anything—at the people among whom I have lived for more than a quarter of a century, and also have upheld and sustained me because I have upheld and sustained them. I have found that the people are a better reliance at the polls than your monopolies and your corporations. The people can give votes if they have not quite as much money as these corporations. Sir, I stand by the interest of the people, and there I intend to stand. I have appealed to this House to say that if this bridge is to remain it will be the same as all other bridges. No corrupt discrimination in favor of this Clinton bridge nuisance, but let all be equal. I ask my friend from Ohio, [Mr. BINGHAM,] so near me, who is a fair, honorable, and just man, why make this exception? Why, after its being shown that this is not a sufficient width of draw, as the committee themselves have decided by making it one hundred and sixty feet, why take this out from all the others and legalize it? I put that question to every member of the House. But my time presses, and I must close without saying half I wish to say. I agreed to yield a moment to my friend from Pennsylvania, [Mr. MOORHEAD.] I yield the remainder of my time to the gentleman from Pennsylvania, [Mr. MOORHEAD.]

Mr. MOORHEAD. I ask simply to have a letter of one of my constituents read. I will state before it is read that the writer, Captain Gray, is largely interested in steamboats navigating the river that pass right under this bridge, and he is one of the most intelligent steamboat men residing in my district.

The Clerk read as follows:

PITTSBURG, March 22, 1866.

DEAR SIR: Permit me to call your attention to the fact that a member of Congress will introduce a bill declaring the "Clinton bridge" a post route. Said bridge is only one hundred and sixteen feet wide in the draw, and is a serious obstruction to the navigation of the upper Mississippi, and a matter in which your constituents are largely interested. If all the bridges on the upper river were compelled to make the draws "two hundred feet in the clear" they would be comparatively no obstruction to navigation. I hope when this bill comes up that you will perceive the necessity of protecting the river interests, and offer such amendments as will do so. The great Mississippi should not be obstructed by any such barriers, and the people of the West have large portions of their grain shipped in "barges," and a few such bridges will effectually stop cheap transportation. I respectfully call your attention to this bill.

Yours, &c.,

R. C. GRAY.

Hon. J. K. MOORHEAD.

Mr. HARDING, of Illinois. I wish simply to state that I coincide with the views of my colleague in relation to the Clinton bridge, and I hope it will not be legalized by an amendment to this bill.

Mr. ALLEY. I now yield five minutes to my colleague on the committee, [Mr. JOHNSON.]

Mr. JOHNSON. I shall not occupy five minutes. My object in rising is to state my position as a member of the committee and also as a member of this House. My absence from the committee for a long time during the winter and spring prevented me from making that investigation of this measure that I desired. The rule which would govern me in this matter is that no draw-bridge ought to be established over any navigable waters unless it is clearly shown that the span of the bridge could not be erected without enormous expense. I have not had an opportunity of ascertaining whether that is the case with all these bridges or not. I have been satisfied in my own mind that in one or two cases draw-bridges are absolutely necessary, and I would indicate the one at Winona as being of that character, there being no bluff at the river bank.

I have not seen any of this outside influence that has been referred to. I never heard an argument before the committee, although I have been attending there for the last six weeks pretty regularly. But now, after there have been intimations made of parties in interest in regard to these measures, I will say that when I hear gentlemen on this floor day by day undertaking to press measures of interest to private corporations or individuals, and when I hear cries against monopolies, it occurs to me with great force to ask the question of this House, are we not becoming the great monopoly of the country? Are we not monopolizing all the legislation of the States? Are we not undertaking to interfere with matters that might much better be referred to the representatives of the States who are prepared to act upon information of their own, and who have more time to deliberate than we have upon such subjects?

Do we not hear it here every day that even the committees have not had that opportunity for investigation that they ought to have? But when a bill is brought before the House under the spur of the previous question, we find the time farmed out, five minutes here and ten minutes there, for the discussion of questions of the most vital interest to the country. That was the case the other day in regard to the telegraph bill, and the gentleman from Illinois [Mr. WASHBURN] was then loud in his opposition to monopoly; and I have also heard him equally loud in his opposition to all railroad monopolies, not only railroads in Illinois, but in other parts of the country. Now, I think it is time that he and others should come to understand that the Congress of the United States is becoming the great monopoly of this country, and is undertaking to regulate all matters relating to the States as well as to the United States. If I had had time to investigate this matter, I should have been able to take a position upon this question. But in consequence of the anomalous action of the Committee of the Post Office and Post Roads, in referring this matter to the House without recommendation, I felt it necessary, being a member of that committee, to make this statement to the House as due to myself personally.

Mr. ALLEY. The gentleman from Illinois [Mr. WASHBURN] has occupied his thirty minutes chiefly in talking about matters that it seems to me have little relevancy to the question immediately before the House, which is, whether the House will vote in favor of making Clinton bridge a post route or not. He has talked a great deal about the Rock Island bridge. I have always believed that the Rock Island bridge was badly constructed, was badly situated. And if that question was before the House to-day it would not receive my vote. But it has no parallel in any respect with the one involved in the question before the House. The Clinton bridge bears no sort of comparison with the Rock Island bridge in its position, or in its structure, or in many other important particulars. It will be recollected that the House voted the other day to alter the Rock Island bridge and change its location, for reasons which I will not stop to relate. But it is not true, as the gentleman states, that there have been so many accidents and so much property destroyed even at that Rock Island bridge. His statements are gross exaggerations, so far as my information extends, even with regard to that bridge. But there is no use in wasting the time of the House upon that point, for it has nothing to do with the question before the House.

But allow me to say in regard to this Clinton bridge and the amount of property destroyed in consequence of it, that it has been in operation eighteen months and but two accidents have occurred, one entirely immaterial, by striking the bridge on going through by a boat, and injuring its guard a little, which did not detain it a single hour, and which did not subject it, I suppose, to an expense of fifty dollars. The other accident was the sinking of a barge, which was the result, according to the testimony, of the grossest carelessness, if not of design. Some charge upon the parties a design to sink the barge. It certainly was an exhibition of the grossest carelessness. Now, in regard to the letter presented by the gentleman from Pennsylvania, [Mr. MOOREHEAD,] allow me to say those statements must be incorrect, for they are the statements of an interested party, a party strongly interested against the bridge. The sworn testimony before the committee was that the draw was one hundred and twenty feet in the clear, while the party whose statements have been read say that it is but one hundred and sixteen feet.

Mr. HOTCHKISS. I desire to ask the gentleman from Massachusetts [Mr. ALLEY] if he intends to give my colleague [Mr. HUBBARD] an opportunity to be heard upon this subject.

Mr. ALLEY. I cannot at this stage.

Mr. HOTCHKISS. It was positively promised him.

Mr. ALLEY. I told the gentleman from New York [Mr. HOTCHKISS] that I should give my colleague upon the committee [Mr. HUBBARD, of New York] an opportunity to speak if he desired and I possibly could; and I purpose to do it. But I did not say when I would give it to him. If the gentleman wanted five minutes to speak I certainly should give it to him; but he has not asked it for himself.

Mr. HOTCHKISS. After I requested some time for my colleague, a half an hour's time was given to the gentleman from Illinois, [Mr. WASHBURN.]

Mr. ALLEY. Mr. Speaker, the gentleman from Illinois has stated that innumerable accidents have occurred at this bridge, and that the testimony so showed. Sir, this is not the fact. The testimony before the committee showed that there had been but two accidents there—one of the most trifling character, and the other, as I before stated, the result of the grossest carelessness.

Now, sir, the gentleman says that he is in favor of bridging the Mississippi; he admits that the necessities of the country require it; but he says that he cannot see how I, a Representative from Massachusetts, can answer to my constituents for advocating and supporting this bill. Mr. Speaker, I consider that my constituents are interested in the passage of this measure, as every member here and the constituents of every member are. I believe that these increased facilities for railroad communication will give us at the East cheaper food. I believe that this measure will benefit us very much indeed; but I admit that it will benefit the people of the Northwest in a much greater degree. In this respect I concur with the gentleman from Illinois.

Now, Mr. Speaker, the gentleman from Illinois has admitted that he is in favor of these bridges as they are reported by the committee in this bill. As I stated when I was previously on the floor, the only difference in the case of this bridge is that the draw is one hundred and twenty feet in the clear, which is a sufficient width, in the judgment both of the committee and of all the parties who came before us, except parties directly interested. They said that the draw should be one hundred and sixty feet wide, and that even this width would be insufficient. Now, sir, in view of the testimony and the facts of the case, these parties are obliged to concede that these draws one hundred and sixty feet wide will not materially obstruct the navigation of the river. They therefore have given up that point, and are willing now that this bill shall pass. Even the gentleman from Illinois has declared his purpose to vote for the bill if we would strike out the provision with reference to the Clinton bridge. Now, Mr. Speaker, I believe, as I before stated, that there can be adduced in opposition to the Clinton bridge no objection that will not apply with equal force to these seven or eight other bridges, if you view the case in all its bearings. The position of this Clinton bridge upon the river is such that, considering all its advantages and disadvantages, the committee were clear in the opinion that this bridge is not so much an obstruction as the others. They had great doubts in reference to the others, and they instructed me to report the general bill without a recommendation, while they have instructed me to report this bill with a recommendation that it pass. While some members of the committee saw grave objections to the other bridges, they did not see any objections to this. The gentleman from Illinois, however, discovers serious objections which none others can discover.

Now, Mr. Speaker, after the committee had occupied weeks in the investigation of this whole matter—after they had listened to all the parties in interest, and in fact all who desired to be heard, including people from the Northwest and elsewhere—the committee were (with the exception of one member situated somewhat like the gentleman from Illinois) unanimous in their deliberate conclusion that no well-founded objection can be urged against this bridge, and they instructed me so to report. Under these circumstances it seems to me fair to presume that the gentleman from Illinois may be a little biased by the wishes of his constituents, by the wishes of those gentlemen in the city of Galena who are largely interested in navigation, who own largely of stock in boats, and whose business they fear may be somewhat interfered with by this measure. The gentleman has quoted here testimony which was adduced before the committee. He has introduced the petition of pilots, navigators, and stockholders interested in boating upon that river, and with a great flourish of trumpets he exhibits that as the voice of the people of the West. Now, Mr. Speaker, is there a man on this floor green enough to suppose that the pilots upon that river and the large owners of boats navigating the river are not opposed to these bridges which will give the people greater facilities for getting their corn and beef and pork and all their other products to the sea-coast by railroad just as cheaply to many points as by transporting them down the river? Does not the history of the world show that at all times when particular interests are imperiled people concerned in those interests rise up and cry out "monopoly?"

Mr. HOGAN. Will the gentleman from Massachusetts allow me to ask him a single question?

Mr. ALLEY. Certainly.

Mr. HOGAN. Does the gentleman mean to say that railroads carry freights as cheaply as they are carried on the rivers? I so understood him; I understood him to say that they can get freight carried as cheaply by railroad as by the river. Does he not know that it costs twice as much by railroad as by the river?

Mr. FARNSWORTH. Does the gentleman from Missouri hold that freight cannot be carried cheaper to the East by railroad than to take it down the river and all the way around by water?

Mr. HOGAN. It can be taken by water at one half the price.

Mr. ALLEY. The gentleman from Missouri asks me whether they can get their produce transported as cheaply by railroad as by water. They cannot to some points, but they can to New York and to the great markets of the East as cheaply as by the river. That is all I meant to say.

Mr. Speaker, the point is this, and only this, that these parties who appeared before the committee in opposition to bridging the Mississippi river were parties in interest. All the people who presented themselves there had direct interest against the erection of these bridges. I do not mention this in disparagement of these gentlemen or their judgment in reference to this matter, but only to show the simple fact that they were interested; that the House may attach only the importance to the testimony that such facts warrant.

Now, this opposition is no new thing. It has always been so all the world over. Macaulay tells us that in 1669, when they proposed to run flying coaches from Oxford to London, it created the greatest commotion and excitement; petitions were immediately sent to the King and Privy Council in opposition to it; all the inn-keepers, all the stock-breeders, all the navigators upon the Thames—indeed, all of the innumerable class of people whose interests were affected loudly protested against it. Yes, sir, in England it created the greatest excitement when the simple proposition was made that flying coaches should run between Oxford and London between sunrise and sunset. It was thought to be intolerable, and denounced as the destruction of vested rights and an invasion that would work serious evils to many important interests. But flying coaches were established notwithstanding. I remember very well when railroads were established in my own State. I remember, when a boy, that when the railroad system as introduced there was the greatest excitement; and all the stage-drivers, tavern-keepers, all those who owned turnpike stock, got up petitions and remonstrances and made the greatest ado, declaring, in order to preserve their business, railroads must be stopped.

I consider this opposition on a par with that I have mentioned. What these men say ought to weigh but little under the circumstances. I do not think it should have the slightest force in determining the judgment of the House against this bill. I do not think the testimony and feelings of these captains and pilots should have any more weight or force than those of any other class of men engaged in any other vocation of life. The testimony on the other side was overwhelming that this bridge does not materially obstruct the navigation of the river. Now, in regard to the suits at law, to which reference has been made by the gentleman from Illinois, [Mr. WASHBURN.] It was stated, if not in the committee outside of the committee, that there were important suits pending against this bridge, and that this would be doing great injustice to the parties who had entered those suits. We made diligent inquiries of all parties who were on the stand, and who ought to have known if anybody knew, whether such suits were pending, and they testified that there were no such suits.

As I said before, this bridge is built in the most satisfactory manner, and the obstruction, if any, is very slight. Let me say, of all the boats which have passed there—ten hundred and forty-eight—in a single year, only these two accidents have happened. I leave it, therefore, to the House to determine whether, under these circumstances, with the great facility the bridge affords for transportation of all this produce, this amendment shall be adopted. Let me show what this was by the sworn testimony of parties who appeared before the committee. The freight over the bridge last year was one hundred and twenty-six thousand tons and fifty-five thousand passengers and twenty trains daily. They open the draw ordinarily in less than three minutes, but are often not more than two minutes. They can open it, as they frequently have done, in one minute. It appeared from the sworn testimony of the parties who were before the committee and who presented statistics that this was so. And not only that, Mr. Speaker, but it is shown that, while twenty trains run over this bridge daily, only four or five steamboats, on an average, pass under it during the season of navigation.

In addition to that, I will say—and it is an important fact in this case that I must notice—that several tons of mail matter go over this bridge daily; and further, that for four months of the year the navigation of the river is obstructed by ice. It is also navigable for small boats only during several weeks in the navigable season. When the river was closed by ice before the bridge was built all the freight had to lie over, and a great deal of it for months. This alone furnishes an argument of irresistible force in favor of bridging this great river; and I submit whether, under these circumstances, the House can refuse to sanction this recommendation of the committee and declare this bridge a post route, when it is shown that the bridge was built in the best possible manner, that but one accident has occurred for eighteen months, and that it was built by the authority of the Legislatures both of Illinois and Iowa. All this was shown and it was shown further that the bridge offers no interference or obstruction worth talking of with the navigation of the river. I will yield now to the gentleman from New York.

Mr. HUBBARD, of New York. I was surprised, Mr. Speaker, to hear the remarks of the gentleman from Illinois. I am a member of the Committee on the Post Office and Post Roads, and this matter was thoroughly examined by that committee, and the committee came to the conclusion that the policy had been adopted that the rivers of this country must be bridged. Here is a company with a capital of some millions of dollars; they start from the eastern States and come to the Mississippi river; they find that the navigation of that river is obstructed by ice for two or three months in the year; they find that the States of Iowa and Illinois have granted the privilege of constructing a bridge across the river; they go on and erect a bridge and it has been in operation over a year. And I am surprised that the gentleman from Illinois, [Mr. WASHBURN,] with all his ability and experience, should get up here and dodge the question and argue the feasibility of another bridge.

Mr. WASHBURN, of Illinois. The gentleman misstates the case; I have referred to the testimony.

Mr. HUBBARD, of New York. I deny that there was any such testimony before the committee.

Mr. WASHBURN, of Illinois. That shows how little the gentleman knows about it.

Mr. HUBBARD, of New York. I must decline to yield. The gentleman speaks of this bridge being a nuisance. Let me tell him that the matter has been before the courts both of Illinois and Iowa.

Mr. WASHBURN, of Illinois. Will the gentleman yield to me for a moment?

Mr. HUBBARD, of New York. I will be as courteous to the gentleman as he was to me when he had the floor. He would not even answer my question. If the gentleman had not drawn upon his imagination, but had left the facts to speak for themselves, I would not have said a word. But I am a member of the Committee on the Post Office and Post Roads, and when the gentleman gets up here and charges the committee with having acted outrageously I cannot sit still. Why, sir, if there be any bridge on this river that should be authorized, it is this. It has been shown to the committee that the draw can be opened in three minutes, and that a vessel can pass in one minute, and it was shown before the committee that there never has been a steamboat or a raft detained there for a minute. There is, however, a conflict between the steamboat interest and the railroad interest. All the facts were brought out before the committee.

[Here the hammer fell.]

Mr. WASHBURN, of Illinois. I ask that the time of the gentleman from New York be extended sufficiently long to enable me to read the testimony which was taken before the committee in regard to the obstruction which this bridge offers to the navigation of the Mississippi river.

Mr. HUBBARD, of New York. I tell the gentleman from Illinois, that the testimony before the committee was right the other way.

Mr. WASHBURN, of Illinois. I would like to have my amendment read, although it is not before the House.

Mr. SPALDING. I object.

Mr. ALLISON. I demand the yeas and nays upon agreeing to the amendment to the amendment.

The amendment to the amendment is as follows:

And that the bridge constructed over the Missisissippi river at Clinton, Iowa, by the Albany Bridge Company, under authority from the States of Illinois and Iowa, be, and the same is hereby, declared to be a postal route and highway of the United States, and may be maintained provided it does not materially obstruct the navigation of said river.

The question was taken; and it was decided in the negative—yeas 54, nays 66, not voting 62; as follows:

YEAS—Messrs. Alley, Ames, James M. Ashley, Baldwin, Baxter, Bundy, Coffroth, Conkling, Eldridge, Farnsworth, Farquhar, Glossbrenner, Grinnell, Hart, Higby, Holmes, Hotchkiss, Asahel W. So the amendment to the amendment was not agreed to.

During the roll-call,

Mr. JOHNSON said: My colleague, Mr. DENISON, is detained from the House by serious illness.

The result of the vote was announced as above recorded.

ENROLLED BILLS SIGNED.

Mr. TROWBRIDGE, from the Committee on Enrolled Bills, reported that the Committee on Enrolled Bills had examined and found truly enrolled bills of the following titles; when the Speaker signed the same:

An act (S. No. 369) to establish certain post roads;

An act (H. R. No. 114) for the relief of A. T. Spencer and Gurdon S. Hubbard;

An act (H. R. No. 742) for the relief of the minor children of Salvador Accardi, deceased;

An act (H. R. No. 741) granting a pension to Jonathan W. Beach;

An act (H. R. No. 739) for the relief of Samantha Rader; and

An act (H. R. No. 702) granting a pension to Mrs. Charlotte E. Reed.

BRIDGES OVER MISSISSIPPI—AGAIN.

Mr. WASHBURN, of Illinois, moved to reconsider the vote by which the amendment to the amendment was disagreed to; and also moved that the motion to reconsider be laid on the table.

The latter motion was agreed to.

The question recurred upon the amendment reported from the Committee on the Post Office and Post Roads as amended by the House.

The amendment was agreed to.

The question was upon the third reading of the bill.

Mr. HOGAN. I move that the bill be laid on the table.

The motion to lay the bill on the table was not agreed to.

The bill, as amended, was then read the third time.

Mr. WASHBURN, of Illinois. My colleague [Mr. HARDING] is very anxious to have incorporated in this bill an amendment, which I will read, and which he understood that the gentleman from Massachusetts [Mr. ALLEY] would not object to. It is as follows:

Strike out all after the enacting clause of section seven and insert the following:

That any bridge that may be constructed under the authority of this act shall not be so located, operated, or constructed as to materially obstruct the navigation of the Mississippi river.

Mr. ALLEY. That is all contained in the bill as it is.

Mr. HARDING, of Illinois. I wish the gentleman would refer to the clause containing that provision.

The SPEAKER. It requires unanimous consent to amend the bill at this stage.

Mr. SPALDING. Then I object.

The question recurred upon the passage of the bill.

Mr. FINCK. Upon that question I call for the yeas and nays.

The question was taken upon ordering the yeas and nays; and upon a division there were—ayes fourteen, noes not counted; not one fifth of the members present voting in the affirmative.

Before the result of the vote was announced,

Mr. FINCK called for tellers on ordering the yeas and nays.

The question was taken, and fifteen members voted in the affirmative; not one fifth of a quorum.

So tellers were refused, and the yeas and nays were refused.

The bill was then passed.

Mr. ALLEY moved to reconsider the vote by which the bill was passed; and also moved to lay the motion to reconsider on the table.

The latter motion was agreed to.

MESSAGE FROM THE SENATE.

A message from the Senate, by Mr. McDONALD, its Chief Clerk, informed the House that the Senate had passed a concurrent resolution of the House for the appointment of a joint committee on retrenchment, with an amendment, in which the concurrence of the House was requested.

DIPLOMATIC APPROPRIATION BILL.

Mr. BANKS. I ask unanimous consent that the Clerk of the House be authorized to correct an error in the action of the House on the consular and diplomatic appropriation bill. By the record it appears that the House concurred in the sixth amendment, whereas the fact is that it did not concur.

There being no objection, the correction was made.

MISCELLANEOUS APPROPRIATION BILL.

Mr. NEWELL asked and obtained leave to print in the debates some remarks he had prepared upon the miscellaneous appropriation bill which was passed by the House yesterday.

[The speech will be published in the Appendix.]

PROVOST MARSHAL GENERAL'S BUREAU.

Mr. SHELLABARGER. The select committee appointed to investigate the statements and charges made by Hon. ROSCOE CONKLING, in his place, against Provost Marshal General Fry and his bureau, whether any frauds have been perpetrated in his office in connection with the recruiting service, and also to examine into the statements made by General Fry in his communication to Hon. Mr. BLAINE, read in the House April 30, 1866, having completed their labors as to one branch of the investigation, have instructed me to submit a report in part, which, together with the evidence herewith submitted, and the arguments of counsel, I move be laid upon the table and be printed; and in connection therewith I submit the following resolutions:

Resolved, That all the statements contained in the letter of General James B. Fry to Hon. JAMES G. BLAINE, a member of this House, bearing date the 27th of April, A. D. 1866, and which was read in this House on the 30th of April, A. D. 1866, in so far as such statements impute to Hon. ROSCOE CONKLING, a member of this body, any criminal, illegal, unpatriotic, or otherwise improper conduct or motives, either as to the matter of his procuring himself to be employed by the Government of the United States in the prosecution of military offenses in the State of New York, in the management of such prosecutions, in taking compensation therefor, or in any other matter charged, are wholly without foundation in truth; and for their publication there were, in the judgment of this House, no facts connected with said prosecutions furnishing either a palliation or an excuse.

Resolved, That General Fry, an officer of the Government of the United States, and head of one of its military bureaus, in writing and publishing these accusations named in the preceding resolution, and which, owing to the crimes and wrongs which they impute to a member of this body, are of a nature deeply injurious to the official and personal character, influence, and privileges of such member, and their publication, originating, as in the judgment of the House they did, in no misapprehension of facts, but in the resentment and passion of their author, was guilty of a gross violation of the privileges of such member and of this House, and his conduct in that regard merits and receives its unqualified disapprobation.

Mr. WENTWORTH. I would inquire if arguments of counsel are ever reported to this House.

The SPEAKER. Any member has a right to object to the printing of the report and accompanying papers, and then the question will be submitted to the House.

Mr. WENTWORTH. I ask if gentlemen propose to this House to publish the speeches of the attorneys before that committee when they are all over town, everywhere. The report of the committee to this House is one thing, the speeches of the lawyers are quite another thing.

Mr. SHELLABARGER. The committee, in pursuance of what it understood to be the usages of the House in matters of this sort, have agreed to recommend the printing of the arguments of counsel on both sides. Those arguments are full and exhaustive, and will be useful to the House in disposing of the important matters that have been submitted by the committee. The committee have no opinion to express upon the subject, but merely desire to conform to the pleasure of the House upon that matter. I call the previous question on my motion to print.

The previous question was seconded and the main question ordered; and under the operation thereof the motion to print was agreed to.

Mr. SHELLABARGER moved to reconsider the vote by which the House ordered the report of the committee with the accompanying papers to be printed; and also moved that the motion to reconsider be laid on the table.

The latter motion was agreed to.

COMPENSATION OF MEMBERS OF CONGRESS.

Mr. NIBLACK, from the Committee on Appropriations, reported a bill to provide for the regulation of the compensation of Senators and Representatives and Delegates in Congress; which was read a first and second time, postponed until Wednesday next, and ordered to be printed.

ASSAULT UPON A MEMBER.

Mr. SPALDING. I now call for the regular order of business.

The House accordingly resumed the consideration of the resolutions reported by Mr. SPALDING from the select committee on breach of privilege, in the matter of Hon. LOVELL H. ROUSSEAU of Kentucky, and Hon. JOSIAH B. GRINNELL of Iowa.

Mr. SPALDING. I ask that the report of the select committee be read.

The report was read, as follows:

The committee appointed by the House to investigate and report upon the facts in the case of the assault committed by Hon. Mr. ROUSSEAU, of Kentucky, upon the person of Hon. Mr. GRINNELL, of Iowa, have attended to that duty, and respectfully report:

That at the close of the session of June 14, while passing from the House through the portico of the east front of the Capitol, Mr. GRINNELL, of Iowa, was arrested by Mr. ROUSSEAU, of Kentucky, who stated to him that he had waited four days for an apology for his conduct toward him in the House. Not receiving from Mr. GRINNELL a satisfactory reply, Mr. ROUSSEAU immediately struck Mr. GRINNELL several blows, with a small cane, upon the face and head until the stick was broken. The time occupied in this transaction was but momentary. The weapon used was a small rattan cane, with iron end. There were from six to ten blows given. No resistance was made by Mr. GRINNELL, and no serious personal injury resulted from the assault. After some words the parties separated, without the direct interference of any person. There were fifteen or twenty persons present upon the portico at the time of the assault, a part of whom were detained there by a shower of rain falling at the moment. No other member of the House was present than the parties named; no person was present as a friend or in company with Mr. GRINNELL; he was without arms or weapon of any kind. Mr. ROUSSEAU had no weapon except that which has been described.

Three persons were present as friends of Mr. ROUSSEAU; the first, on account of information received from Mr. ROUSSEAU that a personal assault was possible, if not probable; the second, on account of a suggestion or call from the first; and the third followed Mr. ROUSSEAU to the portico, on account of his excited appearance and manner when passing through the rotunda. It does not appear that any one of these parties was informed of his intended action except the first. These friends of Mr. ROUSSEAU were all armed with loaded revolver or pistol. The first had taken his weapon with him on the day of the affair, in expectation of what might occur. The second was armed with a pistol which he had carried on his person for a long time, in accordance with the general custom of the country in which he lived, where men from the same neighborhood had served in the Union or the rebel armies. The third was armed with a pistol which it was generally his custom to carry, and which he had upon his person on that day without any reference to the difficulty which occurred. These parties had all served in the Union Army during the war with General ROUSSEAU. None of them had their arms with them at the time of the investigation. It was admitted by them that, in the event of any interference on the part of outside parties, they should have taken part in the contest. No interference being offered, they took no part in the affair, except to advise Mr. ROUSSEAU to withdraw at the close.

No doubt exists as to the cause or purpose of the assault. It was in consequence of words spoken in debate by Mr. GRINNELL, and the object was to disgrace him as a member of the House of Representatives. This was stated by Mr. ROUSSEAU at the time of the assault, and was understood and admitted by one or more of the friends of Mr. ROUSSEAU, as well as by Mr. ROUSSEAU himself, to the committee during the investigation, as the only cause and purpose of the assault.

On the part of Mr. ROUSSEAU it was alleged that his character and conduct as an officer of the Union Army had been assailed by Mr. GRINNELL with epithets and aspersions to which no man could be expected or required to submit; and that as the House had failed to protect him, upon his appeal, in his privileges as a member, he felt it to be his right to vindicate himself and the people he represented.

On the part of Mr. GRINNELL it was alleged that his character had been publicly assailed by Mr. ROUSSEAU on the floor of the House and elsewhere, in such manner as to provoke and justify the remarks he had made.

Both parties presented official reports from the Globe of that portion of the debates connected with this subject, upon which the judgment of the committee was requested. This part of the debate is herewith presented with other evidence in this case.

Nothing occurred in the course of the inquiry to indicate that Mr. GRINNELL was actuated in the slightest degree by malice or personal feeling toward Mr. ROUSSEAU.

Nothing appeared on the part of Mr. ROUSSEAU, apart from the transaction which the committee was instructed to investigate, to impeach his character as a member of the House or as an officer of the Army. Official evidence, which, when presented, the committee could not refuse to receive, showed that he had steadily adhered to the cause of the Government in the period of its greatest peril; that he had been among those citizens who, against the influence of cherished friends and kindred, had honorably resisted the violent and treasonable efforts to sever the bonds of the Union, and firmly held the State of Kentucky to its duty, and that his services in the Army were alike honorable to himself, his State, and the country. Without considering in any manner the question of provocation or justification presented in this case, the committee has been compelled to decide, after mature deliberation, that no provocation can justify a resort to violence against the person of a member of this House. In enumerating the privileges of its members, the Constitution expressly declares that "for any speech or debate in either House they shall not be questioned in any other place." (Article one, section six.)

The theory upon which parliamentary assemblies are founded is that of the inviolability of the person of the representative. No tribunal or officer of the Government is authorized, except in cases of treason, felony, or breaches of the peace, to call him to an account for the part taken in the transactions of the assembly of which he is a member. The existence and authority of legislative assemblies depend upon the recognition of this fundamental law. This is due not less to the dignity of the assembly and the rights of its members than to the people they represent; an act of violence against a representative is an act of insurrection against the people he represents. It cannot be justified by any delinquency or wrong on the part of the representative, which they have not authorized, and for which they ought not to be held responsible or deprived of the rights of representation.

These prerogatives of the representative are so much a matter of public concern that they cannot be taken away by any act of the assembly of which he is a member except by an order of expulsion or its equivalent, or annulled by the Legislature; and so far as they secure to him the right of attendance, it is not in the power of the representative to waive or surrender them. In his privileges are involved the right of representation of the people, and upon their proper recognition the existence of representative government and of political liberty depends.

The committee is therefore of opinion that in the assault upon the person of Hon. Mr. GRINNELL, of Iowa, on account of words spoken in debate, and for the acknowledged purpose of disgracing him as a member of the House and thereby depriving him of his due and just influence and power as a member of this House, Hon. Mr. ROUSSEAU, of Kentucky, committed an inexcusable breach of the privileges of this House, as well as of the people represented by Mr. GRINNELL, for which no provocation or justification can be pleaded, and which merits the strongest condemnation that it is in the power of the House to impose. In forming this opinion the committee has not overlooked the circumstances out of which the assault originated and which have been pleaded as ground of justifiable provocation. The imputation of cowardice in an officer of the Army is an offense to which no reply can be made.

It is difficult to prove the existence of personal courage. A man's character in this respect must be in a great degree a matter of opinion. When it becomes necessary to make an imputation of this character against a member of the House, it should be done with the formality of a charge of official misconduct, accompanied by a statement of the facts upon which it is based, and by which it is to be inferred or proved. The committee is unable to find in this case any justification for an imputation of this character against the Representative from Kentucky. His military services were voluntarily rendered in favor of the Government under which the House holds all its privileges and powers, against a large portion of the people of his own State as well as against his immediate fellow-citizens, relatives, and friends. If anything would justify a resort to violence, which the committee denies, it might perhaps be found in an imputation of this kind. The committee, therefore, recommends that the House express its disapproval of the personal reflection of Hon. Mr. GRINNELL, of Iowa, upon the character of Hon. Mr. ROUSSEAU as a violation of the orders of the House and a breach of the privileges of its members.

It appears from the evidence that three persons were present with arms at the time of the assault. One of them at least had been informed of its probable occurrence, and all of them expressed to the committee their intention to take part in the affair in the event of any unexpected interference on the part of outside parties on either side. It appears to the committee, after mature deliberation, that inasmuch as this occurred in a premeditated and actual assault upon the person of a member of this House, such presence and participation was an offense against the public peace and the privileges of this House which ought not to pass unnoticed. It is therefore recommended that these parties be brought to the bar of the House and held subject to its order.

In these recommendations the committee has performed the duty with which it was charged. But it is, perhaps, proper, in addition to what has been said, to call the attention of the House to the necessity of enforcing the rules of the House against personalities in debate. These rules are founded in a natural reason and right, as well as in ancient parliamentary law. It is the duty of every member of the House to see that they are observed. This depends more upon the temper and purpose of the House than upon its officers.

If the members of the House regard with indifference the violation of the rules of debate in this connection, the dignity of the House, the privileges of its members, and the rights of the people they represent cannot be maintained. Upon a full and careful consideration of all the facts in this case, the committee reports the following resolutions:

Resolved, That Hon. LOVELL H. ROUSSEAU, a Representative from Kentucky, by committing an assault upon the person of Hon. J. B. GRINNELL, a Representative from the State of Iowa, for words spoken in debate, has justly forfeited his privileges as a member of this House, and is hereby expelled.

Resolved, That the personal reflections made by Mr. GRINNELL, a Representative from the State of Iowa, in presence of the House, upon the character of Mr. ROUSSEAU, a Representative from the State of Kentucky, were in violation of the rules regulating debate and the privileges of its members founded thereon, and merit the disapproval of the House.

Resolved, That Charles D. Pomybak of Kentucky, L. B. Grisby of Kentucky, and John S. McGrew of Ohio, by their presence and participation in a premeditated personal assault between Hon. Mr. ROUSSEAU, of Kentucky, and Hon. Mr. GRINNELL, of Iowa, on account of words spoken in debate, in which the persons if not the lives of members of this House were imperiled, were guilty of a violation of its privileges, and they are hereby ordered to be brought to the bar of this House to answer for their contempt of its privileges.

R. P. SPALDING,
N. P. BANKS,
M. RUSSELL THAYER.

Mr. SPALDING. Mr. Speaker, I have called for the reading of this report—

Mr. WILSON, of Iowa. I desire to present a question of order.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Iowa desires to present a question of order, which he reserved at the time the report was made.

Mr. SPALDING. That can come in afterward. I propose now to address myself to the whole subject.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Iowa intended, as the Chair understood, to make the point at the beginning of the debate. If he now rises to a point of order he has the right to arrest all other debate.

Mr. WILSON, of Iowa. I do rise, as I have already stated, to present a question of order.

Mr. RAYMOND. With the permission of the gentleman from Iowa, I ask that the minority report be read.

The SPEAKER. Will the gentleman from Iowa suspend his point of order until the minority report is read?

Mr. WILSON, of Iowa. I will.

The SPEAKER. The report of the minority will be read.

The Clerk read as follows:

VIEWS OF THE MINORITY.

The undersigned concur with the majority of the committee in holding that General ROUSSEAU, in his assault upon Mr. GRINNELL, was guilty of a violation of the privileges of this House, for which there was no justification.

But, considering the very gross provocation received by General ROUSSEAU, the wanton and unjust imputations cast upon his military character and services, the failure of the House to protect him against an assault unwarrantable in itself and a violation of the privileges of the House, and the absence of any intention to inflict severe bodily injury upon Mr. GRINNELL, they are of opinion that expulsion is a punishment more severe than justice or the public interest requires.

They therefore recommend the adoption of the following resolution instead of the first of the series reported by the committee:

Resolved, That Hon. LOVELL H. ROUSSEAU be summoned to the bar of the House, and be there publicly reprimanded by the Speaker for the violation of the rights and privileges of the House, of which he was guilty in the personal assault committed by him upon Hon. J. B. GRINNELL for words spoken in debate.

In recommending the adoption of the other resolutions reported by the committee, the undersigned fully concur.

HENRY J. RAYMOND,
JOHN HOGAN.

Mr. WILSON, of Iowa. The point which I desire to present to the Chair relates to the second resolution reported by the committee. That resolution is in these words:

Resolved, That the personal reflections made by Mr. GRINNELL, a Representative from the State of Iowa, in presence of the House, upon the character of Mr. ROUSSEAU, a Representative from the State of Kentucky, were in violation of the rules regulating debate, and the privileges of its members founded thereon, and merit the disapproval of the House.

I design, sir, to question the authority of the committee to report that resolution to the House; and in order that I may present the point distinctly, I ask that the sixty-first and sixty-second rules of the House be read.

The Clerk read as follows:

"61. If any member, in speaking or otherwise, transgress the rules of the House, the Speaker shall, or any member may, call to order; in which case the member so called to order shall immediately sit down, unless permitted to explain; and the House shall, if appealed to, decide on the case, but without debate; if there be no appeal, the decision of the Chair shall be submitted to. If the decision be in favor of the member called to order, he shall be at liberty to proceed; if otherwise, he shall not be permitted to proceed, in case any member object, without leave of the House; and if the case require it, he shall be liable to the censure of the House.

"62. If a member be called to order for words spoken in debate, the person calling him to order shall repeat the words excepted to, and they shall be taken down in writing at the Clerk's table; and no member shall be held to answer, or be subject to the censure of the House, for words spoken in debate, if any other member has spoken, or other business has intervened, after the words spoken, and before exception to them shall have been taken."

Mr. WILSON, of Iowa. Mr. Speaker, so far as the sixty-first rule applies to this case, I think that it had its full operation on the day of the occurrence of the debate out of which arose this assault. My colleague [Mr. GRINNELL] was called to order on that occasion. He was called to order first by a member of the House, and subsequently by the Speaker. The sixty-first rule provides that upon a member being called to order the Chair shall decide he point; and "if the decision shall be in favor of the member called to order he shall be at liberty to proceed; if otherwise, he shall not be permitted to proceed, in case any member object, without leave of the House; and if the case require it, he shall be liable to the censure of the House."

Now, sir, I find by referring to the proceedings of that day that my colleague was called to order by two members of the House, and subsequently by the Speaker. I hold that under the sixty-first rule, the House declining at that time to take any further notice of the language used, and permitting my colleague to proceed, it bars any subsequent action against him for language uttered at that time. In other words, if an offense against the rule was committed, the action of the House on that occasion was final and complete.

The next point is under the sixty-second rule, and is more important. That rule declares that no member shall be held to answer or be subject to censure of the House for words spoken in debate if any other member has spoken, or other business has intervened, after the words spoken, and before exception to them shall have been taken. I suppose it will be claimed that this case was taken—

Mr. ELDRIDGE. I rise to a question of order.

The SPEAKER. A question of order is already pending.

Mr. ELDRIDGE. Is the point of order debatable?

The SPEAKER. It is.

Mr. ELDRIDGE. I do not wish to cut the gentleman off, but only that the House may know whether it is debatable or not. I thought questions of order were to be decided without debate.

The SPEAKER. That is in reference to priority of business. The gentleman from Iowa is entitled to state his point of order and the ground upon which it is based.

Mr. ELDRIDGE. I will not further interrupt the gentleman from Iowa.

The SPEAKER. The Chair is of the opinion that the gentleman from Iowa is confining himself strictly to the statement of his point of order.

Mr. WILSON, of Iowa. I was saying that I presumed gentlemen would allege that this case was taken out of the operation of the rule by the terms of the resolution referring the case to the select committee. I will read the preamble and resolution:

"Whereas it is alleged in the public press that Hon. LOVELL H. ROUSSEAU, a member of this House from the State of Kentucky, did, on the evening of Thursday, the 14th instant, commit an assault upon the person of Hon. J. B. GRINNELL, a member of this House from the State of Iowa, because of words spoken in debate in this House by the latter; and whereas said assault, if committed, was a breach of the privileges of this House and of the member assaulted; Therefore,

"Resolved, That a select committee of five be appointed by the Speaker to investigate the subject and to report the facts, with such resolutions in reference thereto as in their judgment may be proper and necessary for the vindication of the privileges of the House and the protection of its members, and that said committee have power to send for persons and papers and to examine witnesses on oath."

I presume it will be claimed that by the terms of the resolution this committee were clothed with full power to investigate and report upon everything connected with the assault and alleged provocation. I wish to state, in answer, that what the House cannot do by itself it cannot do through a committee. It appears from the proceedings of that committee that in the proceedings of the House for several days thereafter business of various kinds was transacted. Many members addressed the House; and this resolution was not adopted until several days had transpired. Now, sir, it will be observed that the committee in submitting this report do not propose to change the rule of the House. There is no recommendation that the rule shall be modified in any manner. The resolution reported by the committee comes into this House with the sixty-second rule, which has been read as one of the standing rules of the House, and that rule says—the language of which I will repeat—that no member shall be held to answer or be subject to censure of the House for words spoken in debate if any other member has spoken or other business has intervened after the words spoken and before exception to them shall have been taken. That is the rule of the House to-day, as it was when the resolution was passed providing for a select committee and referring this subject to them for examination. The second resolution reported by the committee and which relates to the words spoken by my colleague is in direct conflict with that rule of the House.

Now, sir, could the House itself at this time censure my colleague for words spoken on that occasion? If we could not do it by original act, can we do it on the basis of a resolution reported by a committee which is a creature of the House, the rule standing just as it existed when the committee was raised? I have not one precedent directly in point. There may be some; but I have one which involves the identical principle, if my view of the force of that report be correct. In the record of the Thirty-Seventh Congress I find that on the 24th of April, 1862, a resolution was offered by Mr. Hutchins in reference to words spoken by Mr. Vallandigham. The subject came up for consideration on the 25th of April, and I find the following report of the proceedings in volume forty-seven, page 1833, of the Congressional Globe:

"The SPEAKER. The question pending when the House adjourned was one of privilege, raised by the gentleman from Ohio, [Mr. HUTCHINS,] against his colleague, [Mr. VALLANDIGHAM.] The following is the resolution submitted to censure the gentleman from Ohio for disorderly words spoken in debate in the Committee of the Whole on the state of the Union:

"Whereas Hon. C. L. VALLANDIGHAM, a member of this House, of the State of Ohio, in Committee of the Whole, made use of the following language concerning Hon. B. F. WADE, a Senator in Congress:

"Mr. Chairman, I have waited patiently for three days for this the earliest occasion presented for a personal explanation. In a speech delivered in this city—not in this House—certainly not in the Senate—no such speech could have been tolerated in an American Senate—I find the following:

"Now, sir, here in my place in the House, and as a Representative, I denounce—and I speak it advisedly—the author of that speech as a liar, a scoundrel, and a coward. His name is BENJAMIN F. WADE."

"And whereas said remarks are a violation of the rules of this House and a breach of its decorum, and deserve the censure of the House: Therefore,

"Resolved, That C. L. VALLANDIGHAM, for said violation of the rules of the House and its decorum, is deserving of censure, and is hereby censured."

"On that resolution the question of order is made that under the express language of the sixty-second rule of the House the gentleman from Ohio could not now be held to answer, or be subject to the censure of the House, for the words spoken, another member having spoken and other business having intervened before exception to them was taken, and that consequently the preamble and the resolution could not be entertained by the House. The Chair will have read the sixty-second rule, and a paragraph from the Manual.

"The Clerk read, as follows:

"If a member be called to order for words spoken in debate, the person calling him to order shall repeat the words excepted to, and they shall be taken down in writing at the Clerk's table; and no member shall be held to answer, or be subject to the censure of the House, for words spoken in debate, if any other member has spoken, or other business has intervened, after the words spoken, and before exception to them shall have been taken.—Sixty-Second Rule.

"Disorderly words spoken in a committee must be written down as in the House, but the committee can only report them to the House for animadversion."—Manual, page 77.

"The SPEAKER. The Chair decides, the gentleman from Ohio [Mr. HUTCHINS] in his resolution not having complied with either the rule of the House or the provision of parliamentary law, that therefore the point of order is well taken."

Consequently the resolution was not considered. Now, I will state the difference between that case and this. This case was referred to a committee and that case was presented by resolution to the House. The Chair ruled that the House itself could not entertain that resolution because another member had spoken after the use of the words by Mr. Vallandigham and the introduction of the resolution. In this case the resolution was sent to a committee for investigation, and it is now claimed by the committee that that gave them jurisdiction of the branch of the case upon which they report the second resolution.

But in regard to that I wish to call the attention of the Chair to the language of the preamble and resolution which gave jurisdiction to the committee:

"Whereas it is alleged in the public press that Hon.

LOVELL H. ROUSSEAU, a member of this House from the State of Kentucky, did, on the evening of Thursday, the 14th instant, commit an assault upon the person of Hon. J. B. GRINNELL, a member of this House from the State of Iowa, because of words spoken in debate in this House by the latter; and whereas said assault, if committed, was a breach of the privileges of this House and of the member assaulted: Therefore,

"Resolved, That a select committee of five be appointed by the Speaker to investigate the subject and report the facts."

Investigate what subject and report what facts? Investigate the subject specified in the preamble, which was the assault by the member from Kentucky upon the member from Iowa, and report the facts in relation to the assault—

"with such resolutions in reference thereto as, in their judgment, may be proper and necessary for the vindication of the privileges of the House and the protection of its members, and that said committee have power to send for persons and papers, and to examine witnesses on oath."

Now, let it be observed that if the committee, in their investigation of this case, had arrived at the conclusion that some additional rule was necessary for the protection of members of Congress against the use of words such as were attributed to the member from Iowa, and had reported a rule for that purpose, they doubtless would have exceeded the jurisdiction conferred upon them. But that is not what they have done. They permit the rule to stand without modification, and they propose a censure of the member from Iowa. It may be said that this resolution is not one of censure, that it is merely a resolution of disapproval. But I apprehend that no member will conclude, upon an examination of the resolution, that it is anything other than a censure, if adopted by this House. Therefore it comes within the second clause of the sixty-second rule, which declares that a member shall not be subject to censure if any other business has intervened between the speaking of the words and the notice of them by the House. These, Mr. Speaker, are the considerations which have presented themselves to me in relation to this case.

Mr. GARFIELD. I would like to ask the gentleman from Iowa a question.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Iowa cannot yield for a question in stating a point of order. The Chair has indulged the gentleman from Iowa to the full extent on the point, which is one of so grave importance. He has examined the authorities, the construction of the rule, and its history, and he has no doubt as to his decision.

Mr. JOHNSON. I would like to make a single suggestion.

The SPEAKER. It is not a subject for debate, but after the decision is made it will be open to appeal.

Mr. JOHNSON. It is but a suggestion.

The SPEAKER. The Chair prefers to make his decision, after which any gentleman may take an appeal. The point raised by the gentleman involves in the first place the rules of debate and the manner of calling to order, and secondly the authority of the committee under instruction of the House.

The sixty-first rule, first read by the gentleman, was adopted, except that part in italics, by the first Congress under the Constitution, April 27, 1789. The sixty-second rule, upon which he mainly relies, is in the precise words in which it was originally introduced by John Q. Adams. The history of the sixty-second rule may perhaps show the reason for its introduction.

In 1832, Andrew Stevenson being Speaker, Mr. Stanberry, of Ohio, in the course of debate, denounced the Speaker for his political course in severe language. The chair was then occupied temporarily by James K. Polk, who was afterward Speaker. No notice was taken by the Speaker pro tempore or by any member of that denunciation until after the speech of Mr. Stanberry had been concluded, when exceptions were taken to it. The next day a motion was made to censure the member for denouncing the Speaker, which was regarded as contempt of the House. After a long debate that motion prevailed by a large majority. But in the course of the debate there was a question raised as to what were the exact words used by the member in debate. There was then no Congressional Globe, nothing but Gales & Seaton's Register of the debates, which was not a verbatim report. To settle the question, however, Mr. Stanberry repeated and reaffirmed the language. The next day John Quincy Adams offered this rule, which was immediately laid on the table. Five years afterward it was taken up and adopted, and has since formed a part of our parliamentary law.

There are two ways to call to order. First, for irrelevant debate. That simply draws the member back to the subject. Second, for disorderly language, transgression of the rules of the House, or indecorum of any kind. The sixty-second rule applies precisely to that. The Chair will read it. Before that, however, the Chair will read the sixty-first rule:

"If any member, in speaking or otherwise, transgress the rules of the House, the Speaker shall, or any member may, call to order; in which case the member so called to order shall immediately sit down, unless permitted to explain."

Under this, the oldest, rule, the primary responsibility of calling to order seemed to be devolved upon the Speaker, but under the sixty-second rule, and this has been the usage since its adoption, the primary responsibility of calling to order devolves upon the members of the House, as will be seen:

"If a member be called to order for words spoken in debate, the person calling him to order shall repeat the words excepted to, and they shall be taken down in writing at the Clerk's table, and no member shall be held to answer, or be subject to the censure of the House, for words spoken in debate, if any other member has spoken, or other business has intervened, after the words spoken, and before exception to them shall have been taken."

The inference is plain that some member calls to order, and the Speaker then rules upon the point. In "personal" explanations, which every Speaker dislikes, out of which grow so much of the trouble, discord, and strife there is in Congress, the Speaker is the only member who is not asked to give his consent to it. It is the unanimous consent of the other members of the House that is required. It is generally understood that the member who asks this consent intends to make some "personal" remarks in review of remarks made in Congress, in the press, or elsewhere, in which he claims to have been misrepresented. And the uniform usage of Speakers has been, with scarcely a single exception, searching far back in our parliamentary history, that when the House grants unanimous consent for a member to make "a personal explanation," the Speaker, who does not give his consent, whose consent is not asked, waits until some member rises to a question of order, when he promptly decides it. There have been very few exceptions, which, indeed, only prove the general rule. One was by the present occupant of the chair, upon the occasion involved in this report, who, after the gentleman from Iowa [Mr. GRINNELL] had been twice called to order by members on the floor, and the points had been sustained, stated that if this line of remark was continued, he should himself check him, and did so.

This sixty-second rule is divided in the middle by a semicolon, and the Chair asks the attention of the gentleman from Iowa [Mr. WILSON] to the language of that rule, as it settles the whole question:

"62. If a member be called to order for words spoken in debate, the person calling him to order shall repeat the words excepted to"—

That is, the "calling to order" is "excepting" to words spoken in debate—

"and they shall be taken down in writing at the Clerk's table; and no member shall be held to answer, or be subject to the censure of the House, for words spoken in debate, if any other member has spoken, or other business has intervened, after the words spoken, and before exception to them shall have been taken."

The first part of this rule declares that "calling to order" is "excepting to words spoken in debate." The second part of the rule declares that a member shall not be held subject to censure for words spoken in debate if other business has intervened after the words have been spoken and before "exception" to them has been taken. Exception to the words of the gentleman from Iowa [Mr. GRINNELL] was taken by the gentleman from Illinois, [Mr. HARRING,] the gentleman from Massachusetts, [Mr. BANKS,] the gentleman from Kentucky, [Mr. ROUSSEAU,] and also by the Speaker of the House, as the records of the Congressional Globe will show. The distinction is obvious between the two parts of the rule. In the first part it speaks of a member excepting to language of another and having the words taken down. In the last part of the rule it says he shall not be censured thereafter unless exception to his words were taken; but it omits to add as an essential condition that the words must also have been taken down. The substantial point, indeed the only point, required in the latter part of the rule is, that exception to the objectionable words must have been taken.

These rules, the sixty-first and sixty-second, are not always carried out to their full extent; it is not always required that the words excepted to shall be taken down in writing at the Clerk's desk, as we have the Congressional Globe in which are printed all the words spoken as taken down by the reporters in full. Sometimes, indeed quite often, the Chair rules upon the question of order as soon as it is raised, without the words excepted to being required by any one to be taken down in writing and read. Sometimes, as to-day, in the debate upon the bridge bill, a member calls another to order, and requires the words to be taken down in writing, when the Speaker rules upon the question of order. Sometimes the rule is carried a step further, and the demand is made that the member called to order shall take his seat until leave is granted by the House for him to proceed in order. Sometimes, but rarely, the House goes beyond this and carries out the rule to its fullest extent and rigor by censuring the offending member upon the spot.

The gentleman from Iowa [Mr. WILSON] read a precedent of Mr. Speaker Grow, from the Thirty-Seventh Congress. But he did not read the language of the Manual which was quoted by the Speaker at that time. The language of Mr. Vallandigham was uttered in Committee of the Whole, when the Speaker was not in the chair and could not be. The Manual lays down a specific rule regulating debate in Committee of the Whole; and this is the rule:

"Disorderly words spoken in a committee must be written down as in the House; but the committee can only report them to the House for animadversion."

The only way the House could have taken notice of the words excepted to in that case, was by having them written down in Committee of the Whole, to be reported to the House. The Committee of the Whole is a different body entirely from the House; it is presided over by a different person and is governed by different rules, as members are all aware. It has no power to censure a member for disorderly words, but must report them specifically to the House for its action.

The Chair is of the opinion, therefore, that under the sixty-second rule, which is composed of two parts, separated by a semicolon, it is distinctly shown by the first part that "calling to order" is excepting to words spoken in debate, and that that can be pursued further, if any member sees fit to do so; that any member can demand that the words excepted to shall be taken down in writing; or a member may demand that the person called to order shall take his seat until the Speaker decides the point. But even if the decision is adverse the Speaker cannot compel him to stop his speech, while any single member on the floor can, by demanding that he shall not proceed further unless by consent of a majority of the House. As this may seem strange to members, the Chair will read from the sixty-first rule:

"If the decision be in favor of the member called to order, he shall be at liberty to proceed; if otherwise, he shall not be permitted to proceed, in case any member object, without leave of the House."

It is for any member to object to another, against whom a point of order has been successfully made, going on without the leave of the House. And the rule seems to be predicated on the presumption that if, out of all the members who heard the objectionable words and the Speaker's ruling against them, no one objects to his proceeding further, they are willing that he shall continue his speech. No such action was had in the House on the 11th of June, when this debate occurred. The Speaker promptly ruled upon every point of order which was raised. He ruled against the gentleman from Iowa [Mr. GRINNELL] upon every point. Any gentleman upon either side had the right to insist that the gentleman should resume his seat and should not proceed until the House had given him permission to proceed in order. But no one raised that point; and thereby the right to raise it was waived. But that does not interfere with the operation of the last part of this rule, which states (inverting the language) that a member can be censured if exceptions to the words spoken by him were taken at the time.

But this case is also settled by the resolution adopted by the House. The gentleman from Ohio [Mr. SPALDING] rose to a question of privilege, and submitted the resolution which has been read by the gentleman from Iowa. The Chair construes the preamble of that resolution somewhat differently from the gentleman from Iowa. That gentleman emphasized the latter part of the preamble, while the Chair thinks that the portion narrating the affair is the substantial part. The Chair will read the preamble and resolution so that the House may judge whether his construction of them is correct. It may be remarked, in passing, that no gentleman moved to amend them, and they were unanimously agreed to by the House as instructions to this committee:

"Whereas it is alleged in the public press that Hon. LOVELL H. ROUSSEAU, a member of this House from the State of Kentucky, did, on the evening of Thursday, the 14th instant, commit an assault upon the person of Hon. J. B. GRINNELL, a member of this House from the State of Iowa, because of words spoken in debate in this House by the latter; and whereas, said assault, if committed, was a breach of the privileges of this House and of the member assaulted; Therefore,

"Resolved, That a select committee of five be appointed by the Speaker to investigate the subject and to report the facts, with such resolutions in reference thereto as in their judgment may be proper and necessary for the vindication of the privileges of the House and the protection of its members, and that said committee have power to send for persons and papers and to examine witnesses on oath."

The resolution referring to the preamble, which states that the member from Kentucky did "commit an assault upon the person of Hon. J. B. GRINNELL, a member of this House from the State of Iowa, because of words spoken in debate in this House by the latter," and holding such assault to be a breach of the privileges of this House and of the member assaulted, instructs this committee to "investigate the subject and to report the facts, with such resolutions in reference thereto as in their judgment may be proper and necessary for the vindication of the privileges of the House and the protection of its members." The Chair thinks that this gave the committee full jurisdiction in the case, by the unanimous order of the House, no one proposing to limit their resolutions, but conferring on them full power to report whatever, on the facts ascertained by them, they deemed proper and necessary for the double object of vindicating the privileges of the House and the protection of its members.

Now, in the case cited by the gentleman from Iowa, in which Mr. Vallandigham used language reflecting upon Senator WADE, if the latter had been in the Hall at the time and when so offensively denounced, had immediately committed a personal assault upon the former, and if a committee had been appointed with instructions to investigate the matter as a violation of the privileges of a member of the House, is it not evident that the House would have expected the committee to report with reference to the whole controversy, even if an immediate collision had prevented the words from being excepted to, taken down and read at the Clerk's table, and ruled on by the Speaker; that the committee should at least have embraced in their report anything closely connected with the transaction—bearing the relation, it might be said, of cause to effect? Certainly this would have been expected by the House. In accordance with this principle was the action of the select committee upon the case which arose in the Thirty-Fourth Congress, when a member from South Carolina, aided by another standing near by, assaulted a Senator from Massachusetts in his seat for words spoken in debate. In that case the committee reported upon the entire subject, including everything out of which the assault grew.

The Chair, therefore, is of opinion that under the instructions unanimously given in this case to the committee by this House the committee had authority to report upon the whole controversy, in accordance with the specific language of the preamble of the resolution providing for the appointment of the committee to investigate an assault caused by words spoken in debate. The Chair, therefore, overrules the point of order.

Mr. ELDRIDGE. Mr. Speaker, I desire to raise the question of order, whether the gentlemen named in the third resolution of the majority of the committee were subject to the jurisdiction of that committee. I mean the resolution referring to Charles D. Pennybaker, L. B. Grigsby, and John S. McGrew. I insist, Mr. Speaker, that the resolution raising this committee and giving them the authority under which they acted did not authorize them to report that resolution. I, of course, will not refer to the fact that no proof of complicity has been reported by the committee against L. B. Grigsby, of Kentucky, and John S. McGrew, of Ohio, for that is apparent to the House; and only a suspicion is reported by the committee in regard to Mr. Pennybaker, of Kentucky. I insist, under that resolution this committee has no right to take cognizance of these gentlemen. The utmost they were authorized to do or could have done was to report the facts to the House. They were not authorized to report a resolution condemning them, and more especially when those were the only witnesses in regard to the facts.

The SPEAKER. The Chair overrules the point of order, for the reasons already stated by him in his decision just made. The committee were authorized and instructed—"To investigate the subject and to report the facts, with such resolutions in reference thereto as in their judgment may be proper and necessary for the vindication of the privileges of the House and the protection of its members."

It was a large authority, and if they had evidence that these gentlemen were connected in any way as accessories to the assault they had the right to report. Citizens have often been brought to the bar of the House for breach of its privileges. In the Fourth Congress the House of Representatives committed Randall and Whitney, two citizens, for attempting to corrupt the integrity of certain members of Congress, which the House decided to be a contempt and breach of its privilege. In the same Congress it was decided that a challenge given by a citizen to a member of Congress was a breach of privilege; and it was also decided, to be a breach of privilege for the official printer (elected under the old law) to publish paragraphs defamatory of Congress in the official organ. The Chair thinks the committee had the right to report the third resolution as well as the second, and therefore overrules the point of order.

Mr. BANKS. I desire to make a single remark in regard to the point of order raised by the gentleman from Wisconsin. In addition to the precedents cited by the Speaker, it has been decided by the Supreme Court of the United States that persons not connected with either House who shall commit a breach of its privilege are subject to its jurisdiction.

Mr. ELDRIDGE. I see no foundation laid in this resolution for the action of the committee. In this respect I think the Speaker misunderstood my point of order. These persons had not been presented, and this committee was not charged with authority over them.

The SPEAKER. They were instructed not only to report the facts, but such resolutions in reference thereto as in their judgment may be proper and necessary for the vindication of the privileges of the House and the protection of its members. It is for the House to determine whether, on the evidence, this resolution shall be agreed to; but it cannot be ruled out as not in order.

Mr. SPALDING took the floor.

Mr. RAYMOND. Will the gentleman permit me to make a motion in the nature of an amendment?

Mr. SPALDING. I cannot do it. I understand what the motion is. I will give the gentleman ample time after I have closed my remarks.

Mr. RAYMOND. My object was to get the whole question before the House.

Mr. SPALDING. Mr. Speaker, I called for the reading of the report of the select committee for the reason that it is as good an argument as can be made in this case. It presents in very small compass the testimony which governs the case and the law which governs the facts. As I highly appreciate that report, I feel bound to give credit to the author of it. Although I had the honor of introducing it, the report was drawn up by the able and experienced member from Massachusetts, [Mr. BANKS.] I feel thankful to him, as I think the House will, for the manner in which he discharged the duty of making this report.

I have never before found myself associated and I never expect to find myself associated with gentlemen who will come to the investigation of a subject with more impartiality than the gentlemen with me on this select committee. We only desired, if possible, to discharge our duty to the House of Representatives and to the people of this Union. We considered it to be a duty of the last importance to the country to inquire whether the highest privileges of the people could be violated with impunity within the walls of this Capitol in defiance of the Constitution of the land and in defiance of the parliamentary law which has governed legislative bodies for more than three hundred years.

Yes, sir, three hundred years is a limited time, because three hundred years ago the House of Commons of Great Britain was first known as a distinct legislative body; and from that time the parliamentary law has been well defined on this subject. But, sir, I think we could go away back of that, even into the sixth and seventh centuries, and find in the council of the Witenagemote this protection for members of legislative bodies which we now ask. I have read in the books, and other gentlemen have done the same, in regard to breaches of privilege committed in Congress, both upon the floor of the House and in the corridors of this Capitol, since our Constitution was adopted. And we can go further back; we can go back to the Confederate Congress, and we find members of that Congress punished for breaches of a lesser degree than this. We can go into the State Legislatures, as well before the adoption of their constitutions as since, and find these breaches of privilege punished, on many occasions even to the extent of imprisonment during the whole of their respective sessions. We have all these before us as precedents. Then we have the constitutional provision, that no man shall be questioned in any other place for words spoken in debate in these assemblies. Here seems to rest much of the difficulty in the minds of members of this House, as well as in the minds of those who have preceded us. Because I have noticed that the argument made against the exercise of the power of punishing an offending member is, that the Constitution means simply to provide that no man shall be sued for damages in one of the States, or in the District of Columbia, if you please, by reason of "words spoken in debate."

Now, sir, the only rational interpretation to be given to this language of the Constitution is this: that no member shall be called to an account for language used in debate. That embraces everything. He cannot be called to an account in an action for libel or slander; neither can he be called to account by men of superior physical ability, holding a rawhide or a rattan over his shoulders. That is the meaning of the Constitution. No man is to be questioned "for words spoken in debate."

Now, if I am right in this interpretation of the language of the Constitution, I ask you, where can a better-defined case be presented than the one which we have to deal with here now? A member of this House uses words in debate which provoke the ire of another member of the body. Four long days intervene, and upon the morning of the fourth day the offended member proclaims that he intends to have satisfaction for the language thus uttered in debate four days before.

Mr. WRIGHT. Does the gentleman mean to say that there is unlimited license for blackguardism in this House, and that a man has no right to protect himself from it? It is the duty of the Speaker to protect men from such assaults, and if he does not do it, it is the duty of the member assailed to protect himself.

Mr. SPALDING. The committee have reported that no word spoken in debate would be a sufficient justification for a member of this House personally to assault and beat another member. And in that I agree without any hesitation or doubt. No word that can be uttered on this floor in regard to a member would justify the infliction of a blow upon a fellow-member, either upon this floor or in any part of the corridors of this Capitol.

Mr. HUBBARD, of Connecticut. Allow me a word.

Mr. SPALDING. I see no necessity of yielding.

Mr. HUBBARD, of Connecticut. I only want to make an inquiry.

Mr. SPALDING. I design to give every gentleman who wishes to do so an opportunity to speak upon this question. I shall take no snap judgment upon it.

Mr. HUBBARD, of Connecticut. The question that I wish to ask is this: whether, if one member maliciously departs from the subject of debate and charges another member with cowardice, these words come within the meaning and spirit of the Constitution as "words spoken in debate?" [Laughter and applause.]

Mr. SPALDING. I wish, in the first place, to mark the outlines in this case. I have said that four days before the assault was committed the words which led to that assault were uttered upon this floor. On the morning of the fourth day the member aggrieved told a gentleman from his own State that he proposed to have satisfaction, and the understanding was that that satisfaction was to come out of the person of the member from Iowa during the course of the ensuing evening. This gentleman, who was a witness before the committee, says that upon that intimation he returned to his room, and that just before the adjournment of the House he came back here, supposing that an assault would be made that evening by the gentleman from Kentucky upon the member from Iowa, and that in the interim he had put his pistol, loaded with powder and ball, into his pocket, and that then he came to the House and accompanied the gentleman from Kentucky to the eastern portico.

Mr. HALE. Allow me a question. I would ask the gentleman if the evidence before the committee did not show that General ROUSSEAU was not aware of this gentleman being armed, that he had no knowledge of his having arms upon his person.

Mr. SPALDING. The testimony before the committee did not show whether General ROUSSEAU knew it or not, excepting so far as the disclaimer of General ROUSSEAU is concerned, who stated that he was not armed and did not know that the others were.

Here is the testimony of Colonel Pennybaker:

"Answer. General ROUSSEAU sent for me on the morning of that day, and told me what would probably occur.

"Question. What did he tell you?

"Answer. He told me Mr. GRINNELL had used harsh language toward him.

"Question. Used harsh language toward him where?

"Answer. I suppose in the Hall of the House; and he was going to use a rattan on him.

"Question. What did he call it? Did he say he was going to chastise him, to flog him, or what?

"Answer. I do not remember what particular expression he used. It is my recollection he said he was going to use a rattan.

"Question. At what time was this?

"Answer. About half past eleven in the morning.

"Question. Where was it the general told you this?

"Answer. It was in the yard below here—between here and the Capitol gate, coming toward the Capitol, between eleven and twelve o'clock.

"Question. Did he tell you on the way when or where he designed to do it?

"Answer. No, sir. I rather inferred from his talk that he contemplated it that evening.

"Question. In consequence of that information did you stay by during that afternoon?

"Answer. I returned and went up to the House in consequence of that information that evening.

"Question. Did you go at the request of General ROUSSEAU?

"Answer. No; the general did not make any request at all. He asked me to come up in the evening, and I arrived there not more than ten minutes before the House adjourned.

"Question. Do you live in Kentucky?

"Answer. Yes, sir.

"Question. What arms had you on your person at that time?

"Answer. I had a three-inch Colt's revolver.

"Question. How was it loaded?

"Answer. Upon my word I do not know. It has been in my drawer for a long time. I suppose it was ordinarily loaded with powder and ball.

"By Mr. BANKS:

"Question. Had you carried it before that day?

"Answer. Yes, sir; it was one I kept in my drawer, and sometimes I put it in my pocket when I went out.

"Question. Had you had it in your pocket within a week before?

"Answer. Yes, sir.

"Question. Had you carried it the day before on your person?

"Answer. No; I think not.

"Question. Then you took it out on account of the information you had received?

"Answer. Yes, sir; I thought it would be as well to have it."

Now, no other inference, I stated, can be drawn from this testimony but that Colonel Pennybaker, being informed by General ROUSSEAU that he intended that evening to chastise the member from Iowa, put the pistol in his pocket and came here.

Mr. HALE. Will the gentleman allow me to appeal to his sense of fairness to read the five lines at the top of the first page so as to show what General ROUSSEAU's knowledge was in regard to the matter?

Mr. SPALDING. Before I do that I wish to say that Colonel Pennybaker testified that he had no intention of using the pistol at all; but it will be found, on a further examination of the evidence, that he and the other two gentlemen who accompanied the gentleman from Kentucky unite in saying, upon cross-examination, that the design was to use their pistols if there was what they called a "free fight;" or something of that kind—they used some western phrase—

Mr. RAYMOND. They intended to see that there was a free fight.

Mr. SPALDING. Yes; and if any person interposed in favor of either one then they expected they might be called upon to use their pistols. That was the evidence.

Mr. Speaker, it is in evidence that the member from Kentucky, after saying to the member from Iowa that he had waited four days for an apology for words spoken here upon this floor, and receiving in reply "What of that?" said "I will teach you what of that." And then he administered blows upon him with his rattan, until, after some eight or ten blows, the stick itself broke, and the pieces were gathered up from the pavement. Now, it is said that no injury was inflicted, and that no injury was designed to be inflicted. Why, sir, the very object of the member from Kentucky, as avowed by himself and sworn to by all the witnesses who said anything upon the subject, was to bring the member from Iowa into disgrace.

And how could he do it more effectually than to whip him around the face and the head and ears and shoulders with a small rattan, stopping occasionally to lecture him, and saying, "Now, you damned puppy and poltroon, look at yourself." The member from Iowa, after receiving half a dozen blows, exclaimed, "I don't want to hurt you." To which the reply was made, "I don't expect you to hurt me, you damned scoundrel, but you tried to injure me upon the floor of the House. And now look at yourself; whipped here, whipped like a dog, disgraced and degraded. Where are your one hundred and twenty-seven thousand constituents now?"

And for what was this assault committed? For words spoken in debate upon the floor of this House in open session; proved so by the witnesses; admitted to be so by the member himself. We have here, then, this bold case of a member of this House four days after he had uttered the language in debate upon this floor, being assailed with violence, and whipped, whipped like a dog, in the eastern portico of this Capitol, in the presence of ten, fifteen, or twenty men, without a hand raised in his defense. But, say gentlemen, this was provoked by the language used by the member from Iowa, derogatory to the character of the member from Kentucky as a chivalrous officer of our late Union Army. Mr. Speaker, whenever any gentleman upon this floor shall see fit to espouse the cause of LOVELL H. ROUSSEAU, and to portray him here as a patriot, as a high-minded gentleman, as a chivalrous soldier, as an officer who in the hour of his country's danger did as much with his bright blade as any other man perhaps, more perhaps than any other man from the old State of Kentucky—I say that whenever any member shall see fit to do that, I will say "amen" to the eulogy, and go him one better on it, in the language of the West. [Laughter.] For my part, if I have read aright the history of the battles of Shiloh, of Perryville, of Murfreesboro', the white plume of the gallant Henry of Navarre might well be paled when compared with that of ROUSSEAU. I doubt not his chivalry; I doubt not his courage. No man in this country, no woman, no child, has a right to disparage the fair military fame of LOVELL H. ROUSSEAU. And sitting in my seat as a member of this House, my blood chilled in my veins when I listened to an imputation to that effect. I cannot for a moment countenance any such imputation; I will set the seal of my reprobation upon it wherever I find it. But the more lofty the character of LOVELL H. ROUSSEAU, the more of a gentleman and a hero you make him out to be, the more of a star you make him in the bright galaxy of our heroes, the worse is the example for all time to come for this House of Representatives. For this hero, this patriot, this high-minded gentleman has seen fit, notwithstanding his four years of discipline in the school of the Army, to break over the discipline which is interposed by the Constitution and by parliamentary law, to violate not merely the privilege of a member of this House from the State of Iowa, but one of the dearest and most hallowed privileges of the people of our whole country.

Unless we can have freedom of discussion upon the floors of Congress, where are we? It was said, in the discussion of that celebrated case of Houston and Stanberry, by the old orator from Rhode Island, Tristram Burges, that free discussion and liberty were contemporaneous fires; they would blaze and brighten, or they would pale and be extinguished together. And, sir, I believe in that as a truth. Liberty among the people of our country depends mainly upon the freedom of debate in this Congress of the United States. How are we to protect freedom and independence in debate if we suffer the violation of these high privileges to be passed over with impunity? It may be said, "You can disapprove of the conduct of General ROUSSEAU as you disapprove of the conduct of the member from Iowa. You can call him to the bar of the House and reprimand him through the mouth of the Speaker."

That is true. All this is now within the power of the House.

But, sir, in a case so well defined as the case of ROUSSEAU and GRINNELL, where there is no possible room for doubt in regard to the intent with which the assault was committed; where it is avowed to have been committal for words spoken in debate, and where it was committed, not in the heat of debate, not when the passions were aroused and on fire, but after four days of cool and deliberate consideration; when with a fixed and fell determination to override the Constitution and the privileges of the House these ignominious blows are inflicted upon the person of a member, we are called upon to determine solemnly that we will content ourselves with nothing less than an ample vindication of the dignity and the privileges of this House.

The majority of the committee have, with great reluctance, come to the conclusion that they must recommend to the House the expulsion of the offending member as the only adequate penalty for an offense committed with so much coolness and deliberation and under such aggravated circumstances. I think, sir, that if it were the last vote I should be called upon to give in this House, I should do violence to my conscience should I give a vote for anything less than expulsion, knowing as I do that the offense has been clearly and perfectly proved, and knowing the consequences which must follow should the House lightly pass over such an infringement of its high privileges.

It may be said "the provocation was great." We all admit it. But, sir, the majority and the minority of the committee concur in the position that the provocation presents no justification whatever. It never will do for members to take into their own hands this administrative justice for offenses given to them on the floor of this House. I was asked awhile ago by a member of this House, "What would you do if a Representative on this floor should in the course of a speech utter words highly derogatory to the character of another member, affecting that member, perhaps, in the dearest family relations?" I care not how high you set the provocation; I say that no language which may be uttered here can justify a member in inflicting personal violence upon another member. "This House of Representatives can 'punish its members for disorderly behavior.'" It has this power by the express provision of the Constitution. It has full power over all the words, all the actions of every member of this body. It is competent for this House to punish a member, even to the extent of expulsion, for disorderly behavior, as well for words of this provoking character spoken in debate, as for any other conduct that is disorderly.

Mr. WRIGHT. Will the gentleman permit me to ask him a single question?

Mr. SPALDING. Certainly. I always yield to the gentleman from New Jersey.

Mr. WRIGHT. I desire to ask the gentleman this question: when one member of this body assails another in language so gross as to degrade the member assailed in his own estimation and in that of his associates, how is redress to be obtained from this House? How shall the member whose character is thus aspersed be relieved from such aspersions?

Mr. SPALDING. In reply to the gentleman I say, that if I could find myself in a mood which would enable me, after the history of the gentleman from Kentucky in connection with the Army, to charge him with cowardice or anything like cowardice, I would deem myself worthy to be expelled from this House. I trust the gentleman is satisfied with my answer.

Sir, with all due respect, I go further, and I say that this House looks at all times to its Presiding Officer to exercise a vigilant control over its proceedings. It depends upon his knowledge of parliamentary law, his experience, his discretion, his judicious use of that potent hammer which he holds in his hand. At the first word uttered by any member in disparagement of a fellow-member, that gavel should sound its reproof, and the member should be called to order. Of this I have no manner of doubt; and I say it with all due respect. I state this, although I know the Speaker has stated it is not the practice of the Chair to call to order when gentlemen have the privilege of the House to make personal explanations. I conceive it will be found to be correct parliamentary law that members of the House at all times are under the authority of the Speaker, and that it is his bounden duty to see that the utmost courtesy prevails among members. If that be not the parliamentary law, then we should take some action to make it so.

It was with that view that the committee reported the second resolution, which disapproves of the language used by the member from Iowa, and they submit to the action of the House whether they will adopt it as their sentiment of disapproval. Now, it may be called a resolution of censure, impliedly a resolution of censure. It is merely a resolution that the House disapproves the language used by the member from Iowa at the time it is said this provocation was given. I suppose the member from Iowa thought himself entitled to use that language because of the precedents set him here at this and perhaps at the last Congress; but in my view such conduct is reprehensible, and the House owes it to itself, if not by the Speaker, that the members of the House themselves shall call to order. I would exert the power of the House as rigidly for the punishment for the use of such language as for the use of violence itself.

The third resolution recommends that three individuals who were advisedly present when these blows were inflicted, should be called to the bar of the House to be dealt with as the House may direct. In doing this the committee designed to establish a precedent which might be salutary hereafter. It is utterly impossible for us to close our eyes upon history. We know what has taken place inside this Hall and in the rooms adjacent to it in years gone by antecedent to the great war of the rebellion. Now, the question will arise in every thoughtful mind, shall we return to such scenes of barbarism as the House has seen here? Shall this House again be turned into a bear garden instead of a hall for deliberation? That is the question we have now to answer to our constituents by our votes. I confess, if it were left to myself, and no other persons were interested in the issue, I would prefer that the case of these gentlemen should be left open. My sympathy runs out to them. I do not wish to see either one of them brought to disgrace or reprehension, but I am looking to the privileges of the House and the liberty of this country. I am looking to the independence of debate and the freedom of discussion, and if we will uphold it we must have the manhood to inflict some of these penalties, not only to protect the rights of our own members, but those who may come hereafter.

I will not trouble the House longer. I have said all I wish to say. The legal question will not be doubted. It has been decided by the King's Bench and by the Supreme Court of the United States. I refer to the case in 6 Wheaton. It has been decided by the Supreme Court of the United States that the House of Representatives of the United States has the power to protect its own high privileges. It has the power to declare for itself what shall be considered a breach of its privileges, and to inflict penalty in that regard, although there may be no existing statute upon the subject. It is incident to the power of legislation.

Mr. ELDRIDGE. I wish to inquire whether these three gentlemen who are outsiders were ever notified that their conduct was under investigation by the committee, and whether an opportunity was afforded to them to present witnesses to be examined in their defense.

Mr. SPALDING. I say to the gentleman, no; they were not charged by the committee with any offense. They were severally inter-gated; each made his own statement of the transaction as it took place, and they were then examined and cross-examined.

Mr. ELDRIDGE. They were examined, then, simply as witnesses?

Mr. SPALDING. Simply as witnesses to show the transaction.

Mr. ELDRIDGE. Were they apprised?

Mr. SPALDING. They were never at any time apprised that they were charged with any violation of the privileges of the House until the report was made.

Mr. ELDRIDGE. I desire to make one further inquiry: whether there is any evidence whatever against Mr. McGrew and Mr. Grigsby of any intention of being present at any difficulty between Messrs. GRINNELL and ROUSSEAU, or whether either of them had any notice or expectation that it was to take place at the time, and whether the report does not show expressly that no one, except perhaps Mr. Pennybaker, had any idea that the affair was to take place.

Mr. SPALDING. In answer to the gentleman I say distinctly that there was no evidence before the committee to show that either Colonel Grigsby or Dr. McGrew knew that this conflict was to take place when they came to the House or until they saw it actually commence at the Capitol. And I say further, that it appears, so far as the examination shows the fact, that they had pistols in their pockets by accident and not by design.

Mr. ELDRIDGE. Does it not appear further in the testimony—it seems to be so in the report—that those two gentlemen had no idea of taking any part in the transaction, but all they admit is, simply, that in case a difficulty had occurred by the interference of outside parties then they might have interfered?

Mr. SPALDING. I think it is not best to refine upon it too much. I will state the facts and the testimony as they were given. Those two gentlemen both disclaim having any knowledge of the chastisement intended to be inflicted by the member from Kentucky upon the member from Iowa. They both protested that they had no knowledge when they came to the Hall of the House that it was to take place. They followed up the other gentlemen for the purpose of accompanying them home to their lodgings; but they both agree that they had loaded pistols in their pockets, that they stood up in a convenient position during the time the blows were struck, and that they both would have interfered if there had been an interference by outsiders in favor of either of the parties. Mr. ROUSSEAU or Mr. GRINNELL.

Mr. ELDRIDGE. Exactly.

Mr. SPALDING. That I understand to mean, in case there was to be a free fight. [Laughter.]

Mr. ELDRIDGE. They did not either of them admit that they expected any such thing; on the contrary, they stated that they did not expect it.

Mr. SPALDING. That is so.

Mr. JOHNSON. I desire to call attention to one or two points in the report. The gentleman stated that these outside gentlemen said they intended to interfere. I understand him in his report, and in the substance of his statement here, to say that they had no previous intention, but when they saw this thing going on they made up their minds that if there was any outside interference then they would go in.

Mr. SPALDING. Decidedly so.

Mr. JOHNSON. Another point. I had intended to submit some remarks, but finding my health will not permit it, I merely call attention to these points. It is stated in the report that "three persons were present as friends of Mr. ROUSSEAU." It strikes me that that language is too strong. It conveys the idea that they were there by previous arrangement. It ought to read, it seems to me, that three persons were present who were friends of Mr. ROUSSEAU, not implying that they were there as his friends.

Mr. SPALDING. It would be more proper to say, one of them, Colonel Pennybaker, was present by previous arrangement, and two of them by accident, or without any design. They did not know, they say, and there is no proof that they knew, that the assault was to be committed, but they were there with pistols in their pockets.

Mr. JOHNSON. Then I will suggest in this connection, that the fact that they were there with revolvers in their pockets does not indicate that they intended to use them on that occasion; because they did not put them in their pockets with reference to this transaction.

I call attention to this passage on page 2 of the report—

"On the part of Mr. GRINNELL it was alleged that his character had been publicly assailed by Mr. ROUSSEAU on the floor of the House and elsewhere in such manner as to provoke and justify the remarks he had made."

Passing over the next paragraph, I now read the following:

"Nothing occurred in the course of the inquiry to indicate that Mr. GRINNELL was actuated in the slightest degree by malice or personal feeling toward Mr. ROUSSEAU."

It strikes me that there is some inconsistency in those two paragraphs of the report.

Mr. SPALDING. That is hardly a legitimate subject of inquiry. The gentleman is putting his own construction on the language of the report. I will yield now to my colleague on the committee, the gentleman from New York, [Mr. RAYMOND.]

Mr. RAYMOND. I desire at present simply to move an amendment to the resolutions reported by the majority of the committee; and it is, to strike out the first resolution reported by the majority and to insert in lieu thereof the resolution reported by the minority of the committee, which is as follows:

Resolved, That Hon. LOVELL H. ROUSSEAU be summoned to the bar of the House and be there publicly reprimanded by the Speaker for the violation of the rights and privileges of the House, of which he was guilty in the personal assault committed by him upon Hon. J. B. GRINNELL for words spoken in debate.

I understand that my colleague [Mr. HALE] desires to move an amendment to that amendment, and I therefore refrain from any remarks at present, although I shall be glad, if the House sees fit to indulge me, to make some remarks on the general question before the debate is closed.

Mr. HALE. I will proceed to-night or yield for a motion to adjourn, if the House pleases. [Cries of "Go on!"] Then I offer the amendment which I send to the Clerk's desk as a substitute for the first two resolutions reported by the committee.

The SPEAKER. The amendment of the gentleman's colleague [Mr. RAYMOND] is to the first resolution, and the gentleman's amendment must apply to that.

Mr. HALE. What I wish is to substitute my amendment for the one offered by my colleague, and also for the second resolution reported by the committee.

The SPEAKER. That will not do. The amendment to the amendment must cover no more ground than the amendment itself.

Mr. SPALDING. I ask for separate votes upon the resolutions reported by the committee.

Mr. HALE. I ask my colleague [Mr. RAYMOND] to withdraw his amendment, so as to enable me to offer mine as a substitute for the first two resolutions reported by the committee.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Ohio [Mr. SPALDING] has demanded a separate vote on the resolutions, and therefore the gentleman from New York cannot move his amendment as a substitute for two resolutions. He can move it as a substitute for the first resolution, and if it be adopted, he can move to lay the second resolution on the table.

Mr. HALE. I accept the suggestion of the Chair, and now offer the following as an amendment to the amendment of my colleague:

Resolved, That this House, while expressing its unqualified condemnation and reprobation of the practice of personal reflection and remarks upon the floor of the House, reflecting upon the character of members in the House, and acts of violence toward members upon any provocation of words, however severe and unmerited; and while expressly asserting its power and authority to protect the privileges of its members, both as respects person and character, yet, under all the circumstances of the case, deem it inexpedient to take any further action in the matter of privilege now pending, so far as affecting Hon. LOVELL H. ROUSSEAU and Hon. JOSIAH B. GRINNELL.

Finding myself, as I do, differing from the conclusions of the entire committee of investigation in this case, it is with great hesitation that I have offered the proposition I have submitted. And I will now proceed to discuss it. The committee which was appointed by the Chair was certainly a committee which commanded and now commands my entire confidence, as I have no doubt it did that of the House. It was a committee so composed as to be unobjectionable to every one, satisfactory to the friends of every party.

Mr. HARDING, of Kentucky. It is now getting to be late. Will the gentleman from New York [Mr. HALE] yield to me to make a motion to adjourn?

Mr. HALE. I will yield for that purpose.

Mr. HARDING, of Kentucky. I move that the House now adjourn.

The question was taken; and upon a division, there were—ayes 60, noes 44.

And accordingly (at four o'clock and twenty minutes p. m.) the House adjourned.

PETITION.

The following petition was presented under the rule and referred to the appropriate committee:

By Mr. PERHAM: The memorial of temporary clerks in the Patent Office, in regard to the continuance of their employment.

IN SENATE.

MONDAY, July 16, 1866.

Prayer by Rev. A. D. GILLETTE, D. D., of Washington.

On motion of Mr. STEWART, and by unanimous consent, the reading of the Journal of Saturday last was dispensed with.

PETITIONS AND MEMORIALS.

Mr. SUMNER presented a petition of citizens of Providence, Rhode Island, praying for the enactment of a law preferring for appointment to all offices persons honorably discharged from the military or naval service who have served for a period of three years during the rebellion; which was referred to the Committee on Military Affairs and the Militia.

REPORTS OF COMMITTEES.

Mr. WILSON, from the Committee on Military Affairs and the Militia, to whom was referred a joint resolution (H. R. No. 176) amendatory of a joint resolution entitled "A resolution respecting bounties to colored soldiers, and the pensions, bounties and allowances to their heirs," approved June 15, 1866, reported it with amendments.

He also, from the same committee, to whom was referred a resolution instructing the committee to inquire into the expediency of providing a system of education for soldiers, asked to be discharged from its further consideration; which was agreed to.

He also, from the same committee, to whom was referred a resolution instructing the committee to inquire into the expediency of restricting all brevet promotions to such officers as have actually served in the field, asked to be discharged from its further consideration; which was agreed to.

Mr. CLARK, from the Committee on Claims, to whom was referred a joint resolution (S. R. No. 111) for the relief of Sergeant Milton McKinnon, reported it with an amendment.

He also, from the same committee, to whom was referred the petition of Janes, Fowler, Kirtland & Co., praying for compensation for damages resulting from the suspension by the Government of the work on the dome of the Capitol from May, 1861, to May, 1862, submitted a report accompanied by a bill (S. No. 429) for the relief of Janes, Fowler, Kirtland & Co. The bill was read and passed to a second reading, and the report was ordered to be printed.

He also, from the same committee, to whom was referred a bill (H. R. No. 518) for the relief of the owners of the bark Maria Henry, reported it without amendment.

Mr. RAMSEY, from the Committee on Naval Affairs, to whom was referred a bill (S. No. 267) authorizing the establishment of a navy-yard and a coal and naval depot at the harbor of Annapolis, asked to be discharged from its further consideration; which was agreed to.

Mr. SUMNER, from the select committee on coinage, weights, and measures, to whom were referred the following bills and joint resolutions, reported them severally without amendment:

A bill (H. R. No. 596) to authorize the use of the metric system of weights and measures;

A bill (H. R. No. 597) to authorize the use in post offices of weights of the denomination of grammes;

A joint resolution (H. R. No. 140) to enable the Secretary of the Treasury to furnish to each State one set of the standard weights and measures of the metric system; and

A joint resolution (H. R. No. 141) to authorize the President to appoint a special commissioner to facilitate the adoption of a uniform coinage between the United States and foreign countries.

Mr. DAVIS, from the Committee on Claims, to whom was referred the petition of Washington Crosland, praying for compensation for damages done to his property in the city of St. Louis, Missouri, by the United States in building a railroad across it, submitted a report, accompanied by a bill (S. No. 431) for the relief of Washington Crosland. The bill was read and passed to a second reading, and the report was ordered to be printed.

Mr. WILLIAMS, from the Committee on Claims, to whom was referred the petition of E. J. Curley, praying for compensation for corn furnished to the United States troops in Kentucky, submitted a report accompanied by a bill (S. No. 433) for the relief of E. J. Curley. The bill was read and passed to a second reading, and the report was ordered to be printed.

Mr. ANTHONY, from the Committee on Claims, to whom was referred the petition of Mrs. Amelia Feaster, praying for compensation for services rendered and supplies furnished to our soldiers while prisoners of war, submitted a report, accompanied by a bill (S. No. 434) for the relief of Mrs. Amelia Feaster, of Columbia, South Carolina. The bill was read and passed to a second reading, and the report was ordered to be printed.

Mr. CONNESS. The Committee on Post Offices and Post Roads, to whom was referred a communication of the Secretary of the Navy, communicating, in compliance with a resolution of the Senate of the 19th of March last, the report of Rear Admiral Charles H. Davis, Superintendent of the Naval Observatory, in relation to the various proposed lines for inter-oceanic canals and railroads between the waters of the Atlantic and Pacific oceans, have directed me to report it back, with a recommendation that it be printed, without the maps, for the use of the Senate, and that five thousand extra copies, with the maps, be also ordered to be printed.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The motion for printing the extra number of copies will be sent to the Committee on Printing under the rules.

RECOMMITTAL OF A BILL.

On motion of Mr. STEWART, it was Ordered, That the bill (H. R. No. 365) granting the right of way to ditch and canal owners over the public lands in the States of California, Oregon, and Nevada; be recommitted to the Committee on Public Lands.

BILLS INTRODUCED.

Mr. ANTHONY asked, and by unanimous consent obtained, leave to introduce a bill (S. No. 430) to regulate the civil service of the United States, and promote the efficiency thereof; which was read twice by its title and referred to the Committee on the Judiciary.

Mr. BUCKALEW asked, and by unanimous consent obtained, leave to introduce a bill (S. No. 432) for the relief of C. F. Johnson, of Alabama; which was read twice by its title and ordered to lie on the table, as the Committee on Claims had previously reported on the subject.

COMMITTEE CLERKS.

Mr. SUMNER submitted the following resolution; which was referred to the Committee to Audit and Control the Contingent Expenses of the Senate:

Resolved, That the clerkships of the standing committees of the Senate be made permanent, at the same rate of compensation as is paid the permanent clerks of the standing committees of the Senate, commencing March 4, 1865; and that part of the duty of the clerks of the standing committees of the Senate shall be to direct and send off all documents published for distribution by order of the Senate.

EVENING SESSION.

Mr. CLARK submitted the following resolution; which was considered by unanimous consent, and agreed to:

Resolved, That the Senate will at half past four, on Tuesday, the 17th instant, take a recess until seven o'clock p. m., the same day, for the purpose of considering bills and reports of the Committee on Claims, and no other business shall then be in order.

MESSAGE FROM THE HOUSE.

A message from the House of Representatives, by Mr. McPHERSON, its Clerk, announced that the House of Representatives had passed a bill (S. No. 236) to authorize the construction of certain bridges, and to establish them as post roads, with amendments, in which it requested the concurrence of the Senate.

The message further announced that the House of Representatives had passed a bill (H. R. No. 775) to establish certain post roads, in which it requested the concurrence of the Senate.

ENROLLED BILLS SIGNED.

The message further announced that the Speaker of the House of Representatives had signed the following enrolled bills; which were thereupon signed by the President pro tempore:

A bill (S. No. 114) for the relief of A. T. Spencer and Gurdon S. Hubbard;

A bill (S. No. 369) to establish certain post roads;

A bill (H. R. No. 702) granting pension to Mrs. Charlotte E. Reed;

A bill (H. R. No. 739) for the relief of Samantha Rader;

A bill (H. R. No. 741) granting a pension to Jonathan W. Beach; and

A bill (S. No. 742) for the relief of the minor children of Salvador Accardi, deceased.

The message also announced that the House of Representatives had passed a resolution of the correction of its message to the Senate for the 11th instant, announcing its action upon the amendments of the Senate to the bill (H. R. No. 261) making appropriations for the consular and diplomatic expenses of the Government for the year ending June 30, 1867, and for other purposes, in respect to the sixth amendment of the Senate to the said bill, which was agreed to by the House with an amendment.

CONSULAR AND DIPLOMATIC BILL.

Mr. SUMNER. I send to the Chair a resolution for the correction of a message from the House. The House have passed an order on the subject, and it should be acted upon at once.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The message from the House will be read.

The Secretary read it, as follows:

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES.

July 14, 1866.

Ordered, That the Clerk be directed to correct and supply an omission in the message announcing the action of the House on the Senate amendments to the bill (H. R. No. 261) making appropriations for the consular and diplomatic expenses of the Government, &c., on the 11th instant, as follows:

Instead of concurring in the sixth amendment of the Senate the House concurred in said amendment with an amendment, as follows:

After "Smyrna" add "Spezzia," and strike out "Spezzia" in schedule C consulates—being a transfer of "Spezzia" from schedule C to schedule B consulates.

Mr. SUMNER. I now offer the following resolution agreeing to the correction made by the House:

Resolved, That the Senate agree to the correction of the message of the House of Representatives in respect to its action upon the amendments of the Senate to the bill (H. R. No. 261) making appropriations for the consular and diplomatic expenses of the Government for the year ending June 30, 1867, and for other purposes, as requested by the House.

The resolution was considered by unanimous consent and agreed to.

CALIFORNIA LAND TITLES.

Mr. POMEROY, from the committee of conference on the disagreeing votes of the two Houses on the bill (S. No. 343) to quiet land titles in California, submitted a report that the Senate agree to the first proviso of the tenth amendment of the House, in these words: "Provided, however, that from decrees of the district courts as aforesaid made after July 1, 1865, and prior to the passage of this act, an appeal may be taken to the United States circuit court of the State of California within one year from the approval of this act;" and that the House recede from the second proviso of that amendment.

The report was concurred in.

HOUSE BILL REFERRED.

The bill (H. R. No. 775) to establish certain post roads was read twice by its title and referred to the Committee on Post Offices and Post Roads.

HENRY S. DAVIS.

Mr. BROWN. I desire to submit the views of the minority of the Committee on Public Buildings and Grounds, in opposition to the bill (S. No. 427) for the relief of Henry S. Davis. A majority report was submitted on Saturday, and notice was given at the time that the views of the minority would be submitted to-day. I move that they be printed.

The motion was agreed to.

MARINE HOSPITAL AT YOKOHAMA.

Mr. EDMUNDS. I move to proceed to the consideration of Senate bill No. 403, making an appropriation for the erection of a marine hospital at Yokohama, in Japan, and for other purposes. It is a short matter that will not excite any opposition.

Mr. CONNESS. I desire to call up for consideration the resolution that I submitted on Saturday, authorizing the Secretary of the Treasury to audit and settle the accounts of Caleb T. Fay and William Y. Patch, late assessor and collector of internal revenue at San Francisco. I believe it is in the form of a concurrent resolution, and I ask the Secretary to change it so as to make it a joint resolution.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Senator from Vermont moves that the Senate now proceed to the consideration of Senate bill No. 403.

Mr. CONNESS. Is it not first in order to call up this resolution which was laid over by an objection on Saturday?

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Chair thinks there is no priority of resolutions over other subjects where a motion is made in regard to a bill; it stands on the same ground as a motion in regard to a resolution. It is in the power of the Senate of course to give a preference, when they see proper by their vote, to one subject over another. The question now is on the motion of the Senator from Vermont to take up the bill (S. No. 403) making an appropriation for the erection of a marine hospital at Yokohama, in Japan, and for other purposes.

The motion was agreed to; and the bill was read a second time and considered as in Committee of the Whole. It proposes to appropriate $10,000 for the purpose of constructing a marine hospital for the use of the United States, and to furnish the same with proper furniture, instruments, and medicine, at Yokohama, in Japan. This sum of money, or so much thereof as shall be necessary for the purposes stated, is to be expended under the direction of the Department of State.

The bill was reported to the Senate, ordered to be engrossed for a third reading, read the third time, and passed.

C. T. FAY AND W. Y. PATCH.

Mr. CONNESS. I move now to proceed to the consideration of the resolution that I named a moment ago.

The motion was agreed to; and the Senate proceeded to consider the joint resolution (S. R. No. 132) authorizing the Secretary of the Treasury to audit and settle the accounts of Caleb T. Fay and William Y. Patch, late assessor and collector of internal revenue at San Francisco.

Mr. CONNESS. I move that the Secretary be directed to insert a title to that resolution and make it a joint resolution. It was introduced as a concurrent resolution, but it should properly be a joint resolution.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Senator can modify his resolution as it suits him.

Mr. CONNESS. I have done so. There is a letter accompanying the resolution, from the Secretary of the Treasury, which explains it fully—a very short letter, which I ask to have read, and then I shall ask for the present consideration of the resolution.

The Secretary read the following letter:

TREASURY DEPARTMENT, July 13, 1866.

DEAR SIR: I inclose to you herewith a proposed resolution authorizing the settlement of the accounts of Caleb T. Fay and William Y. Patch, late assessor and collector of internal revenue at San Francisco, upon an equitable and just basis.

From the report to me of clerks of this Department appointed as a committee to investigate the accounts of those officers, and to settle them, if possible, I am satisfied that by reason of informality in the appointment of certain persons who acted and were paid by the collector as assistant assessors, the accounts of these gentlemen cannot be justly settled without the aid of some legislation like that proposed in accompanying resolution. I therefore desire to call the attention of Congress through you to this subject.

Very respectfully,
H. McCULLOCH,
Secretary.

Hon. D. C. McRUE, M. C.,
House of Representatives.

The joint resolution was read three times and passed.

COMPENSATION OF OFFICERS OF SENATE.

Mr. WADE. I move to take up for consideration Senate bill No. 411, fixing the compensation of officers, clerks, messengers, and others in the service of the Senate.

Mr. HOWE. I appeal to the Senator to allow that bill to lie over until to-morrow, for this reason: the Joint Committee on the Library have adopted a proposition which they have instructed me to report as an amendment to that bill. It has not yet been drawn up; and I wish the Senator would allow the bill to lie over until to-morrow so as to allow that amendment to be drawn up.

Mr. WADE. I will inquire whether the proposition that the Committee on the Library is deliberating upon covers the same ground that this bill proposes to cover.

Mr. HOWE. The amendment does not cover the same ground, but it has reference to the pay of the officers of the Library.

Mr. WADE. That has nothing to do with this measure.

Mr. HOWE. I was instructed to offer it as an amendment to this bill.

Mr. WADE. I am afraid that this bill will not pass at this session if it is longer delayed.

Mr. STEWART. I hope the Senator will allow it to lie over temporarily until I can call up a bill which will not take any time.

Mr. WADE. I will let it pass by for the present, but I give notice that I shall call it up again to-morrow.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The motion is withdrawn.

TERRITORY OF MONTANA.

Mr. STEWART. I move to take up for consideration House bill No. 466, which has been reported from the Committee on Public Lands.

The motion was agreed to; and the bill (H.

R. No. 466) erecting the Territory of Montana into a surveying district, and for other purposes, was considered as in Committee of the Whole. It proposes to erect the Territory of Montana into a surveying district; and to authorize the President of the United States, by and with the advice and consent of the Senate, to appoint a surveyor general for that Territory, who is to hold his office at such place in the Territory as the Secretary of the Interior may direct, but the location of his office may be changed from time to time if, in the opinion of the Secretary of the Interior, the public interest should require it; and the powers, duties, obligations, and responsibilities of the surveyor general are to be the same as are now prescribed by law for the surveyor general of Oregon. His salary is to be $3,500 per annum for his services, with proper allowance for clerk hire, office rent, and fuel; which allowance is not to exceed the amount now allowed, or that may hereafter be allowed by law, to the surveyor general of Oregon.

The Committee on Public Lands reported an amendment, which was to change the provision for the salary of the surveyor general from $3,500 to $3,000.

The amendment was agreed to.

Mr. STEWART. I offer the following amendment in the shape of additional sections:

And be it further enacted, That the said Territory of Montana be, and is hereby, created a land district, to bear the name of said Territory, the district land office of which shall be established at such place within the land district as the President of the United States may from time to time direct.

And be it further enacted, That for the purpose of carrying this act into effect, the President shall be, and he is hereby, authorized to appoint, by and with the advice and consent of the Senate as in similar cases, a register and receiver for said district, who shall be required to reside at the site of the district land office, and whose powers, duties, obligations, and responsibilities, compensation and emoluments shall be the same as now allowed by law for like officers in New Mexico.

The amendment was agreed to.

Mr. WADE. I offer the following amendment, to come in as an additional section:

And be it further enacted, That said surveyor general shall select and survey eighteen alternate odd sections of iron-mineral or timber lands within the said district, for the New York and Montana Iron Mining and Manufacturing Company, incorporated under the laws of the State of New York, which lands the said company shall have immediate possession of on payment of $1 25 per acre, and shall have a patent for the same whenever, within two years after their selection they shall have furnished evidence satisfactory to the Secretary of the Interior that they have erected and have in operation on the said land iron-works with a capacity for manufacturing fifteen hundred tons of iron per annum: Provided, The said lands shall revert to the United States in case the above-mentioned iron-works be not erected within the specified time: And provided, That until the title to the said lands shall have been perfected the timber shall not be cut off from more than one section of the said lands.

The question being put, Mr. BUCKALEW called for a division.

Mr. WADE. As a division is called for, I wish to explain the amendment. It is certainly germane to the bill, and it proposes to permit this company to make iron in Montana and to have a certain number of the odd sections surveyed by the surveyor general in making his surveys for that purpose, that they may purchase them at the usual price; but it is to be land on which there are no minerals, but wood alone; nor are they permitted to take the wood, except upon one section, until they have complied entirely with the grant, paid for the land, and are making their iron according to it. This amendment, I believe, fails to encounter any of the objections which were made to the bill which was introduced before in regard to this company. None of the objections which the President had to the former bill apply to the provisions embodied in this amendment, and I believe it meets the approbation of most, if not all, the members of the Committee on Public Lands. I showed the amendment to all the members of the committee who were here at the time, and none of them had any objection to it. I hope it will be adopted, for I am sure nothing can be more beneficial to the people of that Territory than this will be if it is permitted to pass. I hope no opposition will be made to it.

Mr. POMEROY. The amendment which the Senator from Ohio has proposed is, I think, free from the objections that were made to the former bill on this subject. I certainly am very willing that it should pass. I think there should be no objection to it.

Mr. WADE. I showed it to all the members of the committee who were present, but I believe there are some now present who were not here then.

Mr. BUCKALEW. I supposed it was precisely the same measure that had been vetoed.

Mr. POMEROY. This is drawn to obviate the objections of the President.

Mr. BUCKALEW. The only thing that occurs to me in this connection, after the explanation which has been made, is that it is a very remarkable section which it is proposed now to insert in this bill, that a certain survey shall be made to a particular party, excepting the case of those who are interested in this mining company from the operation of the general laws. I do not understand why we should select out the particular mining company in question and authorize them by act of Congress to have particular sections ordered to be surveyed to them. If they desire lands why do they not go in and take them up under the general laws? I do not understand the reason for this discrimination, unless it be to give some advantage which the general laws would not confer upon them.

Mr. WADE. It gives them no advantage over anybody else; it only anticipates the time when these men can go and take all the land they please by paying the Government price for it. Those composing this company are very anxious to try the experiment of making iron in Montana now. It will be some time before the land in that Territory will be surveyed. The proposition in this bill is to appoint a surveyor general to survey the Territory, but it will take a good while to do it. Now, if these men can secure wood enough to warrant them in attempting this enterprise they want to do it. There is no special advantage to them in this section. There is no mineral land grant; there is nothing else in it than simply allowing them to go in and locate themselves on this land at once, so that they may find enough wood to run a furnace to make iron.

Mr. JOHNSON. Are they to pay for the land?

Mr. WADE. Certainly, pay for all the land they get. They are anxious to pay for it. If they do not pay for it they do not get it; and if they do pay for it they do not get it unless they make fifteen hundred tons of iron a year, and it all comes back to the United States. There is nothing in the amendment but what is perfectly patent on the face of it. Here is a company who are willing to try the experiment; they are wealthy men, they are excellent business men, men of the highest character, that have been led to believe that they can do business there for their own benefit and greatly to the benefit of the people of the Territory if they can be permitted to go there and set up a furnace and make a large quantity of iron. But the difficulty under which they labor, as everybody can see, is in regard to securing title to woodland, for it will take a good deal of woodland to run a furnace that is worth anything. They have got to lay out, they say, nearly two hundred thousand dollars in their apparatus and in commencing their business, setting up a large furnace. The moment they begin to do it anywhere, everybody will see that they will want a great deal of wood and at once other men, taking advantage of what they are about, seeing what they want, will squat on all the woodland in the vicinity, and then the company will be entirely at the control of those who have got the wood around them. This is a wild country, heavily wooded. There is no trouble about wood in Montana. If any gentleman has read the surveys of that country he will find that they all represent it as an exceedingly heavy wooded country; but then no prudent man would go there and lay out a large sum of money for a furnace unless he could assure himself that he would have wood enough to make coal to run it, and it will take a good deal.

Now, I ask, is there any possible objection to their having that? It was objected that the other bill gave them the right to take certain lands that had coal if they could find it. This is an entirely different thing. There is not a mineral land grant in this amendment; they are not even permitted to cut wood except from one section until the thing is entirely complied with. Is there any objection to that?

We have given away and granted, since I introduced that other bill, I do not know but a hundred million acres of land for railroads and other purposes; and if you look at your Northern Pacific railroad bill that passed here last, I think you will find it is subject to every objection that was made by the President to the little bill that I introduced. There the company take all the land; they are not restricted to coal land or anything else; and you are granting away millions upon millions of land by bills to which all the objections made to the little bill to enable these people to go in there and try the experiment of setting up a furnace apply. It is the smallest thing that I ever knew so strongly objected to, for I ask every candid man in this Senate, is there a sane man that can fail to see that in that remote country, where every pound of iron has got to be dragged a thousand miles at a cost of some thirty cents a pound before you can get it there, nothing would develop it more than to have a furnace on the spot that could make iron, and thereby enable the people to set up their mining establishments, their crushing-works, and everything else?

It seems to me that, so far from being any favoritism to a company, it would tend more to develop the country than anything else. It is a small affair, to be sure; but it is not indifferent to the people that are there and are going there. They all want it to be done as a matter of prime necessity in that remote country. I hope, sir, there will be no objection to it. The objections the President made to the other bill are entirely avoided by this. It seeks no advantage, and the other bill did not seek any advantage. It had things in it that might be objected to, but they were not sought, I am sure, to gain any advantage, for the features objected to were put on that bill by the Committee on Public Lands in putting it into such a shape that it ought to pass. All I ask is for such a measure as will accomplish the purpose of encouraging the production of iron in this remote Territory.

Mr. BUCKALEW. I think there is no analogy between grants of land to a railroad corporation and particular grants of land to a private party or to a private business corporation. A railroad is a public highway, and there are public objects connected with the making of improvements of that description which do not apply in other cases. I make this observation in answer to the suggestion of the Senator from Ohio that our grants to railroad companies of lands in the West will justify our grants, as I understand him, to individuals or to corporations wherever there are legitimate objects connected with the bill. But, sir, under the explanations which he has submitted, although I have not critically compared the present amendment with the bill which was recently vetoed by the President, I withdraw the call for a division.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The call for a division being withdrawn the amendment is agreed to.

The bill was reported to the Senate as amended, and the amendments were concurred in. It was ordered that the amendments be engrossed and the bill be read a third time. It was read the third time and passed.

CODIFICATION OF CUSTOMS LAWS.

Mr. CRESWELL. I move that the Senate take up for consideration Senate joint resolution No. 82.

The motion was agreed to; and the Senate, as in Committee of the Whole, proceeded to consider the joint resolution (S. R. No. 82) to provide for codifying the laws relating to the customs. It directs the Secretary of the Treasury to cause to be prepared and submitted to Congress at its next session a general customs revenue law, designed to supersede all other laws on that subject, and embracing all necessary provisions for regulating the foreign and coasting trades, the assessment and collection of duties on goods, wares, and merchandise imported from foreign countries, and other subject-matters immediately pertaining thereto; the expenses necessarily incurred in the preparation thereof to be paid from the appropriation for the expenses of collecting the revenue from customs.

The Committee on Commerce reported the joint resolution with two amendments. The first amendment was to insert after the word "session," in line five, the words "under the direction of one member of the Senate and one member of the House of Representatives, each to be appointed by the Presiding Officer of the body to which he belongs."

The amendment was agreed to.

The next amendment was to add at the end of the resolution the following proviso:

Provided, That the said expenses shall not exceed $10,000.

The amendment was agreed to.

Mr. HARRIS. I desire to inquire of the Senator from Maryland whether this whole subject is not embraced within an act that has already been passed for the general codification of the acts of Congress. It seems to me it has been already provided for.

Mr. CRESWELL. My impression is that that bill has not passed the House.

Mr. HARRIS. It has passed the House and is a law; and candidates are already applying to the President for nomination to engage in that work of codifying the laws of Congress, embracing, of course, these laws as well as others.

Mr. CRESWELL. I can only say in regard to that, that the Secretary of the Treasury seems to feel the deepest interest in the passage of this resolution; and if it be passed and these laws be codified, they will be completed as that they will not only be of service to the Department, but of service to those gentlemen who may be appointed to codify all the laws. It is proposed that the laws applicable to the collection of duties and to the management of the revenues generally shall be prepared by certain officers of the Department, under the direction of one member of the Senate and one member of the House of Representatives, before the meeting of the next session of Congress, that a report shall then be had, and action finally taken upon it. If the gentlemen hereafter to be designated by the President shall undertake to codify all the laws of the United States, it is more than probable that it will be two or three years before they will be able to present such a report as will be accepted by Congress, and then it may be that a long delay will follow. This work seems to be absolutely necessary for the successful working of the Treasury Department, and I will read to the Senate what the Secretary of the Treasury himself says on this subject. Speaking of the complication of laws which has resulted, he says that in regard to the assessment and collection of duties alone based upon the act of March 2, 1799, up to the year 1845, there had been passed at least one hundred and twenty-five different laws, and since that time almost as many more. Besides that, there are other classes of laws which are necessary for the public convenience, one relating to the foreign and coasting trade and another relating to special provisions necessary to meet the necessities of commerce on the lakes and rivers for the northeastern, northern, and northwestern frontiers, and in regard to them the Secretary of the Treasury says:

"The result is an immense complication in the details of the various provisions relating to the collection of the revenue and the carrying on of the coasting and foreign trades; and an intricate system of legislation on this entire subject has grown up, in which statute refers to statute and amendment to amendment on so many points, that the law governing a specific case is in many instances with difficulty discovered. This is a source of grave embarrassment to officers of the customs whose position requires prompt action and a clear application of the law to facts as they arise. This Department endeavors to render the laws intelligible by the issue of circulars and regulations; these are, however, but a partial remedy for the evil, and go but a short way toward supplying the want of a uniform and consistent code, with its subjects so arranged and classified that the law upon any given point may be summarily ascertained."

My impression is that this is a work that is absolutely necessary and should be done at once, and that it should not be delayed until all the laws of the United States have been codified in the manner proposed by the general proposition. No harm, certainly, can result from it; and I think this work being done in the Treasury alone, by officers who have a perfect knowledge of the difficulties arising out of the complication of these laws, it will, perhaps, forward the work of the gentlemen who are to be appointed to codify all the laws.

Mr. HARRIS. I am not at all opposed to this measure. I can see very well the necessity for a codification of the laws relating to the revenue. The difficulty I have is that we have already provided for it. Commissioners are to be appointed; we may expect their nomination any day; and the duty of those commissioners will be to codify all our laws. I have supposed that to one of those commissioners would be assigned the duty of codifying the revenue laws. Are we not likely, if we pass this resolution, to have two sets of commissioners at work on the same subject? It will be the duty of these commissioners, by law, to codify all the laws. It seems to me the Senator from Maryland must modify his proposition in some way so as to relieve the commissioners to be appointed under the law already passed from this portion of the duty now assigned to them; otherwise we shall have two sets of men engaged in the same work.

Mr. CRESWELL. The difficulty arising out of that is precisely the one that I have stated; that, owing to the immense deal of work that will devolve upon the codifiers appointed generally over the whole system of laws, it will necessarily be a long time before any definite result can be reached, perhaps five years.

Mr. SUMNER. No, not so long as that.

Mr. CRESWELL. It is very difficult to tell how long it will be. It is a very extensive work; it will require a great many corrections; and the entire operations of the commission will have to be carefully revised by certain gentlemen of both Houses of Congress, and they being called upon to act anew on the subject, it will necessarily lead to other long delays. I have had some experience on this subject myself in the State of Maryland, where we attempted to codify the acts of our Legislature, and it resulted in very great delays. It was some three or four years, or perhaps five years, before we had completed that system, and it was then full of defects; and the Legislature ever since has been endeavoring to correct it. What we want here is, to place at the disposition of the Treasury Department a certain correct system of the laws, presenting them, as it were, at one view; so that the Department may submit a uniform system of instructions and laws to all the officers of the General Government throughout the country. That seems to be a desideratum, for the want of which the Department has been suffering the greatest inconvenience; and the anxiety of the Secretary of the Treasury is so great on that subject, that I am disposed to call for the vote of the Senate upon this proposition, believing, as I do, that it will only facilitate the general work to which the honorable Senator from New York has referred.

Mr. SUMNER. The object of the Senator from Maryland would naturally form a chapter in the labors of the commissioners that are about to be appointed for the revision and consolidation of all the statutes of the United States. Of course, in that revision a very important chapter would be all the statutes relating to the revenue service of our country. Now, as I understand the Senator, he proposes that another commission, in advance of the commission which has already been authorized by Congress, shall take this special subject of the revenue statutes. I have no evidence before me that the case is sufficiently urgent to justify this double effort, if I may so express myself; that is, if the motion of the Senator from Maryland shall prevail, we shall have two sets of commissioners at work on that same subject. Does the occasion require it? Are we justified in setting these two machines in motion? Is not one enough? I have no evidence before me to show that one is not enough.

Mr. GUTHRIE. This resolution, which was introduced by me and was referred to the Committee on Commerce, provides for an object which is thought to be necessary, of having a codification by Congress of the laws relating to the customs. I will state to the Senate that under a resolution of Congress during the time I was Secretary of the Treasury I caused to be compiled a code of the revenue laws, which was reported to Congress, but not acted on during the period that I remained in the Treasury.

At the instance of the present Secretary of the Treasury I introduced this resolution. The compilation as made then is printed and still exists in the Treasury. It will be a very light work to bring down that codification of these laws to the present time. I hope the Senator from New York and the Senator from Massachusetts will withdraw their opposition to this measure. The codification can be returned at the next session, and if adopted by Congress it can be printed as a portion of the general codification, for it will come in and be acted upon long before that general codification. I deem it absolutely and essentially necessary to a systematic and faithful performance of their duties by the officers engaged in the revenue service to have the revenue laws reduced into one body, so that all the collectors and other revenue officers and every merchant in the United States can understand the law. I think it is right enough to have a general codification of all the laws; but we cannot have that for five years, and I do not believe it will be finally passed by Congress in ten years. This codification is ready prepared, only needing some amendments to make it suit the present time and some modifications which the experience of the experts in the Department may have suggested. I trust gentlemen will withdraw their opposition to the resolution.

Mr. SUMNER. In what I said a moment ago I intimated a doubt as to the expediency of this second commission. I confess, however, that I have been very much impressed by what has fallen from the Senator from Kentucky. His argument in favor of this work seems to me to be very strong. It is quite patent that the main work cannot be completed for some time; but, as I understand from the Senator, the proposed codification of the statutes relating to the revenue ought to be done as soon as possible. I am told it is needed now, and if that is the case I shall certainly make no opposition.

The joint resolution was reported to the Senate as amended, and the amendments made as in Committee of the Whole were concurred in.

The resolution was ordered to be engrossed for a third reading, and was read the third time.

Mr. SPRAGUE. I move that the resolution be referred to the Committee on Finance, with instructions to report on the second Tuesday in December next. It is well known that an important bill from the other House has been referred to that committee, which, if passed at the next session, will alter the revenue laws very materially. It would seem to me very appropriate to refer this resolution to that committee, that they may see whether it is necessary that these laws should be codified and arranged.

Mr. CRESWELL. I hope that will not be done.

Mr. HOWARD. If we are likely soon to come to a vote on the measure now before us, I shall not call for the order of the day. Otherwise, I must insist upon it.

Several SENATORS. Let us have the vote.

Mr. TRUMBULL. I trust that this joint resolution is not to pass. It seems to me a very singular species of legislation. We have at this session already passed through both Houses of Congress a law which has received the approval of the Executive, appointing three persons to codify and revise the laws of the United States; and now you are proceeding to do it by piecemeal in this way. The very object of our commission, which will cost the Government probably $50,000, is thwarted by a proposition now to have the laws revised by some of the clerks in the Revenue Bureau, for I suppose they are to make this revision. I trust such a proposition as this is not to pass. This work ought to be done under the supervision of the commissioners appointed by the President, by and with the advice and consent of the Senate, to revise and codify the laws generally. If this portion can be got into shape at an earlier day so much the better. If labor has already been bestowed upon it, these commissioners will have the benefit of that labor. They will have authority to go on and make a report upon this branch of the laws before reporting the general revision of all the laws. It seems to me that this provision is incongruous with what we have already done, and such a proposition ought not to pass, and I trust it will not pass. If Senators had considered it, and what we have already done, it strikes me they would not now consent to a proposition of this kind becoming a law. To-morrow some one else will propose that the military laws be revised—they have been published in a separate volume under the supervision of some person already—and the next day the naval laws, and the next those relating to the courts. Thus we shall have no harmony, no simplicity, in the laws which are to be revised and consolidated, as we trust, so that everybody can understand them. These laws will have more or less bearing on other statutes. Has the Senator from Massachusetts, as I understand he is in favor of this measure, reflected that many of these laws relating to customs are mixed up with other statutes and have an important bearing on them?

Mr. CRESWELL. They must be codified, nevertheless.

Mr. TRUMBULL. Is the general codification of the laws to be made subservient to a revision got up probably by some clerks? I do not know who is to get out this revision. Does the Senator know?

Mr. SUMNER. No, I do not. I know nothing about it.

Mr. TRUMBULL. It seems to me this is all immature and inconsiderate. I do not know what committee it comes from.

Mr. GUTHRIE. The Committee on Commerce.

Mr. TRUMBULL. I hope the motion of the Senator from Rhode Island will prevail, and that this matter will be referred to the Committee on Finance, to be considered and reported on at the next session, or that we may make some other disposition of it than to pass it at the present time.

Mr. GUTHRIE. I hope the motion of the Senator from Rhode Island will not prevail. He might as well offer a resolution that until we are done legislating upon the subject of the customs we shall have no modification of the customs laws. He says we are to have the tariff bill reported from the Senate committee next December. They may not report that bill at all, or they may make it a very different bill from what it now is. That will be part of the customs laws when passed, and so of any other bill passed at the next session. It is absolutely necessary and essential to the proper understanding of the revenue laws to have this codification. I have no question that we are losing money every year and every day for the want of it. There are over one hundred and twenty acts of Congress to be considered in assessing the revenues under the existing laws, and a great many of them conflicting and of difficult construction. Then we have the opinions of the Secretaries, and we shall have them again. They make a new explanation of the laws every once in awhile.

Mr. TRUMBULL. Will the Senator from Kentucky allow me to inquire of him who is making this revision?

Mr. GUTHRIE. When I was Secretary of the Treasury Congress passed a resolution providing for codifying these laws, and I had it done by experts in the office and a gentleman from Pennsylvania whom we employed under the resolution. The codification was reported to Congress, but they did not act upon it. I found the codification here printed this winter, just as it was reported to Congress, and in a conversation with the experts in the office they desired very much to have this codification completed and they prepared a resolution for that purpose which I introduced here, and which the Senator from Maryland has reported from the Committee on Commerce. The codification is already prepared, and it only wants the modification that different legislation since that time and the additional experience that has been acquired in the office renders necessary. It was introduced into this body before the measure to codify the general laws. That was not objected to because this was pending and should not have been, because if this codification should be reported to us and we should pass it next session, or the session afterward, it will be a long while before the general measure will come before Congress, and you will not get Congress to pass on that until some years after it has been reported and printed. I trust we shall vote down the proposition to refer the resolution to the Committee on Finance. I would rather see it rejected at once.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The question is on the motion of the Senator from Rhode Island to refer the resolution to the Committee on Finance with instructions to report upon the same on the second Tuesday in December next.

The motion was not agreed to.

Mr. TRUMBULL. I call for the yeas and nays on the passage of the resolution.

The yeas and nays were ordered.

Mr. JOHNSON. Is it the purpose of the resolution that the commission, to be appointed under its authority, is to report to us a tariff bill, to revise the duties now imposed? ["Oh, no."] It seems to be very comprehensive in its terms.

Mr. GUTHRIE. It includes all the navigation laws.

Mr. CRESWELL. It is to be a revision of the existing laws affecting the customs and all kindred subjects.

Mr. SUMNER. I think that the expense ought not to exceed $5,000; $10,000 is too much. I think the Senate had better let the resolution be amended by substituting $5,000 for $10,000.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The resolution is not now amendable, except by unanimous consent.

Mr. CRESWELL. It only gives the Secretary of the Treasury a discretion up to $10,000; he thinks it will require that much to do the work properly.

Mr. SUMNER. That is too much. I do not want to give that much.

Mr. GRIMES. I have no doubt in my mind that this resolution ought to pass and that the public interest will be subserved by its passage. As to the amount that is involved in the resolution, that, I suppose, will not be expended if the purposes can be accomplished in any other way.

I understand the Senator from Illinois and some other Senators to object to the passage of this resolution because if it is adopted we shall have a duplicate codification. Now, as I understand it, this is to relate to our navigation and commercial laws. The men who would be properly selected to codify the residue of our statutes, in relation to the judiciary, the definition of crimes, &c., would not be the proper men to investigate this subject and to report to us such a codification as we desire. This matter should be investigated and a report made to us by men of experience in commerce and navigation, and I think the Committee on Commerce is exceedingly wise in proposing it, and that it will save us a large amount of money, because now different constructions are put upon our various tariff laws. We have been told here that we are now attempting to administer the customs laws under nine different tariff acts. The purpose is to get all these into one law, so that we shall know really what the law is, so that the wayfaring man, though a fool, cannot err therein. I have not heard any measure latterly that I shall vote for with more pleasure than I shall for this proposition to codify the revenue laws.

Mr. SPRAGUE. I wish to call the attention of the Senate to the views expressed by the Senator from Iowa. Everything that relates to ships, to the Navy, to water, finds in him an advocate: while he is very tenacious about the expenses of all other departments of the Government. When any consideration is asked for bills relating to those branches of the public service, you find him on the alert and willing to extend any facility. It seems to me that when you are to modify your tariff laws at the next session, which will alter that whole branch of the subject, there can be no injury in delaying this matter from this time to that. Besides, it is very well known that but little work can be done here in this hot weather, and I presume all this work is to be done in Washington. I think the parties concerned will do just as much work commencing in December, if it is so thought advisable by the Finance Committee, as they would by commencing now. It seems to me they will simply get the pay between now and December and do no work. I trust the resolution will not pass.

Mr. CRAGIN. I hope the resolution will pass. For four years I was special agent of the Treasury Department, and had occasion to study these laws, and I say here to-day that there is almost absolute necessity for this codification.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The question is on the passage of the joint resolution.

The question being taken by yeas and nays, resulted—yeas 80, nays 8; as follows:

YEAS—Messrs. Brown, Chandler, Conness, Cowan, Cragin, Creswell, Davis, Edmunds, Foster, Grimes, Guthrie, Harris, Hendricks, Howard, Howe, Morgan, Morrill, Nesmith, Norton, Poland, Ramsey, Riddle, Sanbury, Stewart, Sumner, Van Winkle, Wade, Wiley, Wilson, and Yates—80.

NAYS—Messrs. Buckalew, Henderson, Nye, Pomeroy, Sherman, Sprague, Trumbull, and Williams—8.

ABSENT—Messrs. Anthony, Clark, Dixon, Doolittle, Fessenden, Johnson, Kirkwood, Lane of Indiana, Lane of Kansas, McDougall, and Wright—11.

So the resolution was passed.

MESSAGE FROM THE HOUSE.

A message from the House of Representatives, by Mr. McPHERSON, its Clerk, announced that the House had passed a bill (H. R. No. 787) exempting pensions from internal revenue tax, and a joint resolution (H. R. No. 188) for the appointment of a commission upon transportation between the western States and the Atlantic sea-board; in both of which the concurrence of the Senate was requested.

NORTHERN KANSAS RAILROAD.

Mr. POMEROY. I desire to call up the report of the committee of conference on the bill (S. No. 145) for a grant of land to the State of Kansas to aid in the construction of the Northern Kansas railroad and telegraph, which was submitted on Saturday, but which was laid aside at the request of the Senator from Maine, [Mr. FESSENDEN,] who has since examined it, and says he has no objection to it. I merely desire to have a vote on the report. It has been read.

There being no objection, the Senate resumed the consideration of the report.

Mr. POMEROY. I move that the Senate concur in the report.

The motion was agreed to.

MISSISSIPPI RIVER BRIDGES.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The unfinished business of Saturday is the bill (S. No. 387) to secure the speedy construction of the Northern Pacific railroad and telegraph line, and to secure to the Government the use of the same for postal, military, and other purposes. Before proceeding to its consideration the Chair will present, by the indulgence of the Senate, a bill which has been returned from the House of Representatives with amendments.

The Secretary read the amendments made by the House of Representatives to the bill (S. No. 236) to authorize the construction of certain bridges, and to establish them as post roads.

Mr. TRUMBULL. I move that the Senate concur in those amendments of the House.

Mr. HENDERSON. I move to refer the bill and amendments to the Committee on Post Offices and Post Roads. I am not going to discuss this question; the weather is too warm to make anybody think of anything of that sort. The Senate know that I have opposed the passage of this bill. The bill was passed by the Senate authorizing a bridge at Quincy, one at Hannibal, and one at Burlington. I opposed that provision of it which allowed draw-bridges. The bill went to the House of Representatives and they have sent it back with amendments adding a bridge at Prairie du Chien, one at Keokuk, one at Winona, one at Dubuque, and one at Kansas City on the Missouri, making seven draw-bridges on the Mississippi river. Since the bill was passed in the Senate, a proposition by the chairman of the Committee on Post Offices and Post Roads was adopted in this body, sent to the lower House, and adopted there, providing for an actual survey of the Mississippi river to ascertain by a board of competent engineers whether it is advisable to bridge the river in this way or not, and to report at the next session of Congress. I hope that the Senate, after having passed that measure, will not insist upon passing this bill. If there is a proposition in which my constituents feel a deep interest, and which they would regret very much to see passed, perhaps more than any other measure, it is the one now before the Senate.

I will state another fact, that since the passage of this measure in the Senate a plan has been laid before us by General Palmer, who has built the bridges on the eastern division of the Pacific railroad, and who has very successfully built them, which plan I now hold in my hand. It is a submerged iron tubular bridge to be sunk entirely below the bed of the river. He assures us that it is perfectly practicable; and beyond that I have the indorsement of six or seven of the most eminent civil engineers in this country, and upon them is the indorsement of Mr. Linville, the eminent civil engineer of Philadelphia.

Mr. HOWARD. I perceive that the measure is going to lead to a protracted discussion, and I must therefore insist upon proceeding with the order of the day.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The order of the day being called for will be proceeded with.

Mr. HENDERSON. I cannot consent that this bridge bill shall be passed without explaining the matter.

Mr. TRUMBULL. It is evident that the Senator from Missouri, who has fought this bill from the beginning, will make all the delay he can.

Mr. HENDERSON. I will fight it to the close, undoubtedly.

Mr. TRUMBULL. We may as well meet it at one time as another. I trust that the bill which has now passed both Houses of Congress is not to be defeated simply by dilatory action. Let it come up, and let us have the action of the Senate upon it. If a majority are opposed to bridging the Mississippi river; if they wish to recede from what was done here very deliberately—the Senator from Missouri contested the thing a whole day—be it so. I am entirely willing, except for the time it would take, to go over the argument with him again. I think it was shown, and it can be shown again, to be of the highest importance that this bill should pass. My State has quite as much interest in the Mississippi river as has the State which the Senator represents; she happens to be on the other side of the river from his State; that is all the difference. I wish to preserve the Mississippi river as well as to have these railroads accommodated.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. Further debate on that bill is out of order, unless there is a motion to postpone all prior orders and proceed with it.

Mr. TRUMBULL. I desire to inquire of the Chair if this measure will not come up as soon as the other bill is disposed of.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. Being business from the House of Representatives, the Chair would present it to the Senate at any moment when there was a cessation of business. Subject to a vote of the body at any time, business from the House of Representatives is considered as having precedence, and it is the duty of the Chair to lay it before the body always at all practicable times.

Mr. TRUMBULL. Before the special order is taken up, I desire the attention of the Senator from Missouri a moment on the bill with regard to the bridging of the Mississippi river. I understand that he desires to refer it to the Post Office Committee. I have no objection to its being referred if it is not to be delayed by that course.

Mr. HENDERSON. I do not seek any delay, but I desire the Post Office Committee, which has the profile that I held in my hand before it, to examine the matter again.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Chair must again suggest that debate on the bill alluded to is out of order at the present time, unless there be a motion to postpone the order of the day.

Mr. TRUMBULL. I ask the consent of the Senator from Michigan to allow the special order to be laid aside informally for a moment, that we may refer the bridge bill so as to get it disposed of. I shall not object to the reference if it is not going to delay the bill.

Mr. HENDERSON. My motion is simply to refer it.

Mr. TRUMBULL. Let it be referred, then, to the Post Office Committee.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The question, then, is on the motion of the Senator from Missouri to refer the amendments of the House of Representatives to Senate bill No. 236 to the Committee on Post Offices and Post Roads.

The motion was agreed to.

Mr. BROWN. I desire to offer an amendment to the House amendments to that bill, which I ask leave to have referred also to the Post Office Committee.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Chair is of opinion that on a motion to refer to a committee a bill of the Senate with amendments of the House of Representatives it is not so before the Senate that a motion to amend the House amendments is in order. When the bill shall have been reported from the committee, it will be in order to propose an amendment to the House amendments; but an amendment which comes from the House and by a vote of the Senate is referred to a committee, must be acted upon, in the opinion of the Chair, without any amendment from the Senate.

Mr. BROWN. Can I not, by unanimous consent, have my amendment referred to the committee, for the purpose of consideration there?

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. Certainly, by unanimous consent.

Mr. GRIMES. I object.
The PRESIDENT pro tempore. Objection being made, the amendment cannot be received.

UNIFORM BANKRUPT LAW.

Mr. POLAND. On my motion on Saturday, the House bill to establish a uniform system of bankruptcy was made the special order for to-day at one o'clock. I am aware that by our rules the unfinished business of Saturday takes precedence, and as that measure is one which I feel some anxiety to have passed, I do not wish to antagonize it with the bankrupt bill, but I desire to give notice that as soon as that measure is disposed of I shall ask the Senate to proceed to the consideration of the bankruptcy bill, and I hope we may be ready to have it considered.

NORTHERN PACIFIC RAILROAD.

The Senate resumed the consideration of the bill (S. No. 387) to secure the speedy construction of the Northern Pacific railroad and telegraph line, and to secure to the Government the use of the same for postal, military, and other purposes.

Mr. HOWARD. Mr. President, I did not expect the bill now under consideration would have encountered so earnest an opposition on the part of the Senator from Ohio, [Mr. SHERMAN.] I had hoped that looking upon the measure in the light in which I am compelled to regard it, we should have had the benefit of his support; but for some reason his convictions lead him to oppose the passage of this bill. In the fervor of his opposition he has made some statements to which it is my duty to endeavor to make a reply.

His first and leading objection appears to be that the Northern Pacific railroad is to be a rival line to the Union Pacific railroad. I do not regard it in that light. What is the route of the Union Pacific railroad? Proceeding from its eastern terminus, already fixed by an order of the President of the United States, and running to the Pacific ocean, you will find that its average latitude, so to speak, is about the fortieth degree. That will be the line, generally speaking, upon which that route will proceed from east to west. This will leave a region between that road and the northern national boundary line of nine degrees of latitude, a space no less than six hundred and twenty-five miles wide from south to north; while its length from east to west is not less than eighteen hundred miles; making a surface of not less than eleven hundred thousand square miles. By the charter of the Northern Pacific railroad, the company in laying down its line is required to run it, so far as practicable, upon the forty-fifth degree of latitude, from Lake Superior on the east, commencing either in Wisconsin or in Minnesota, running westwardly and terminating at Puget sound. The probability is that the general line will lie somewhat north of the forty-fifth degree of latitude. But if it shall run upon that line as required by the charter—and to this I desire to call the attention of the Senator from Ohio—the distance between this line and the Union Pacific line will not be less on an average than three hundred and forty-seven miles. The space lying between the two lines will be just about that number of miles in width, while the space lying between the Northern Pacific railroad route and the divisional boundary line between the United States and the British possessions will not, upon an average, be less than two hundred and seventy miles in width. I am utterly unable to see how it can happen that the Northern Pacific railroad is to be a rival of the Union Pacific, lying, as it must, three hundred and fifty miles to the north of it. The internal business that will be conducted upon these two roads will, of course, be furnished to the one and the other by the industry and the enterprise of the American people, who shall proceed into that distant region and settle and become the permanent owners of the soil, carrying on all the branches of industry and trade by which the necessary patronage is to be furnished to both roads. I have yet to learn that railroad men have regarded two roads lying three hundred and fifty miles apart as necessarily or practically rival lines.

Sir, there is no rivalry, that I can perceive, except the very remote one in the East India trade; and I take it that my friend from Ohio would not oppose a measure like this upon the sole ground that the two roads might become competitors for the American trade in the East Indies. I apprehend that rivalry will have hardly a perceptible effect upon the revenues of either road. It will be so small, in comparison with the other business which both will transact, as not to be felt in the estimates; but even if it be felt, I can perceive no reason whatever why the northern portion of the United States, of which this region constitutes so large a part, should be deprived of any benefit which their industrious and enterprising population may be able to derive from the employment of the Northern Pacific railroad, and the East India trade in connection with it. It is useless to disguise the fact that it is the determination of the people of the northern States to open this great avenue to the East Indies, and to have those facilities which are necessary in carrying forward settlement and enterprise of all descriptions into this wild, and at present unsettled region. Gentlemen may depreciate it; they may doubt it; but, sir, the decree has gone forth, and it will not be in the power of Congress to reverse it, that a Northern Pacific railroad shall and will be constructed through that region, and that northern capital and northern enterprise and northern labor shall have the benefit of it.

The second objection made by the Senator from Ohio to the passage of the bill is that it "gives" to this company a no less sum than $122,000,000 without security. I was not a little surprised at this statement. I cannot conceive what are the elements out of which it is made. He did not see fit to lay them before the Senate, or to refer to any data in his possession or within his knowledge justifying him in making so gross a misrepresentation of the scheme of the bill. I do not suppose the Senator designed making a misrepresentation of the contents of the bill. He possesses too much candor and too much honesty of heart to justify me in bringing such an imputation.

Mr. SHERMAN. As this is a matter of figures about which we certainly ought not to differ, I will state to the Senator that I take the amounts from the bill itself, and the distances furnished me by gentlemen interested in this road. I can give him the precise figures. I have the computation here.

Mr. HOWARD. I shall be very glad to be informed of the data upon which that statement was made.

Mr. SHERMAN. I will give you the data. The guarantee is for four hundred and fifty miles east of the one hundred and first meridian of longitude at $24,900 a mile, given by the bill, making $10,950,000. The guarantee is for six hundred and twenty miles west of the one hundred and first meridian of longitude to a certain point in the mountains at $32,000 a mile, making $19,840,000. The third guarantee is for five hundred and twenty miles west of and in the range of mountains, at $98,900 a mile, making $51,428,000. The guarantee for the western division, which is not fixed, but is estimated, is three hundred and fifty miles at $57,000 a mile, making $19,970,000; making the principal of the stock guaranteed $102,143,000. You pay six per cent. interest on that for twenty years, which makes the precise amount I gave to the Senate, $122,572,600, with a great probability of the length of the line being increased by the surveys of the route and the windings across the mountains to make it longer than is estimated for; but I give the distances as I find them in the terms of the bill. I do not think that as to the amount there ought to be any question.

Mr. HOWARD. Mr. President, that estimate is upon the assumption that the Government will be called upon absolutely to pay the interest upon the principal sum which he has mentioned for twenty years and receive nothing whatever in return. That is a pretty broad assumption. It is in effect imputing to this company a design to get the guarantee of interest upon their stock, use their stock, build their road, and never pay the Government of the United States a single cent by way of reimbursement. Is that a fair mode of treating such a company as this? Is it not probable, I submit to the Senator, that this company will under the bill be compelled from time to time to pay to the United States whatever they may receive for the lands lying on the south side of the route? Certainly they will be so compelled. The terms of the bill require it. The moment they sell the lands upon the south side of their route they are required by this bill to pay over the proceeds into the Treasury of the United States. The Senator assumes that they will designedly cheat the United States by retaining the proceeds, which are a trust fund out of which payment is to be made. The Senator assumes further that for the transportation which the United States will necessarily require of that company during the twenty years, we shall not receive a dollar from the company. Does the Senator suppose that the United States will have no transportation upon that route? If he will look at the statement made by General Meigs of the amount of transportation through that wilderness region during the year 1865, he will find that the United States in 1865 paid out more than six million dollars for freight on Government stores and Government property of various kinds, all or a large portion of which would have been transported over this road had it been built. The road is to be completed at the end of ten years; and after it shall have been completed, as it must be according to its charter within that time, then twenty-five per cent. of the net earnings of the road is to be appropriated to the reimbursement of the United States on account of this interest. Sir, it struck me at the time that the honorable Senator from Ohio was somewhat too venturesome in his zeal against this bill in the statements he made. When examined in the light of the bill and of existing facts, it will appear that it vanishes into thin air, and that there is really no foundation for his assumption.

Another objection raised by the Senator was, that at the time of the passage of the Northern Pacific railroad charter, in 1864, it was agreed between the company and Congress that they would never ask the United States for any cash subsidy. I was not in my seat at that time, and cannot, therefore, speak with confidence as to any assurances they may have given. It is sufficient, however, to refer to the charter itself, in which it is declared that no money shall be paid out of the Treasury of the United States on account of this road; so careful was Congress to guard the Treasury against any obligations or liability of this description. What are the facts? The charter of the Union Pacific railroad requires the Government to lend to that company and its three branches, for every mile of road constructed, a sum of not less than $16,000 to aid them in the prosecution of the work; and through the mountain regions along that route the Government is required to lend them $48,000 per mile for a distance of three hundred miles in the whole. The liability of the United States under that charter, on account of the bonds it is to issue, will not be less than $50,000,000, and will probably exceed that amount; while in reference to the Northern Pacific railroad the Government refused, in 1864, to lend them a single dollar, either in cash or credit. It is very true, as the Senator remarked, that Congress gave to the company twice the quantity of land per mile on the Northern road that is possessed by the Union Pacific, in the hope, undoubtedly—for it is not to be doubted that that was the hope and the expectation of Congress—that they would be enabled to proceed and finish this great and majestic undertaking solely by the proceeds of this liberal donation of land. But, sir, it has turned out to be an impossibility. The bonds of the United States which are issued to this Union Pacific Railroad Company and its branches are in the market, and are coming monthly into the market, and are there offered to capitalists, who lend their money upon them at a rate at which no other party can borrow that does not possess equal facilities. It is utterly impossible, for this reason, for the Northern Pacific Railroad Company to go into the market and borrow money. So stringent was the charter which was passed in 1864 that it actually prohibits that company from mortgaging a single foot of its line from beginning to end for the purpose of raising money or any other purpose; while, at the same time that the Government makes this large cash subsidy to the Union Pacific railroad of $16,000 and $48,000 per mile, it allows that company to mortgage its road, section after section, as the sections shall be completed, and actually postpones the claims of the United States as a creditor lending money, to the claims of private persons who become lenders upon the bonds of the Union Pacific Railroad Company and its branches. Under this state of things it is palpable to every man who will reflect that it is totally impossible that the Northern Pacific can borrow money to such an amount and upon such terms as will enable it to proceed with its work.

Now, sir, let it be clearly understood that the guarantee demanded of the Government by this bill is solely for the payment of the interest upon the stock of the company at six per cent. a year as the various sections of twenty-five miles of road shall be completed. With the payment of the stock itself we have nothing to do. The bill requires no further liability from the Government than the payment of the interest of six per cent. upon the stock as the various sections shall be completed from time to time, and it is not to be supposed that a road such as this will be when it shall be constructed, or when part of it shall be constructed, will be without revenue. Persons who are acquainted with the character of northern men, persons who see the vigor and rapidity with which settlements are pressed forward into the far West, cannot doubt for a moment that this road will be productive of revenue; I think, in the end, it will turn out to be as productive of revenue to the company as will be the Union Pacific railroad. I have before me a table containing estimates, made with as much accuracy as is attainable at the present time, as to the amount of the liability of the United States on account of this interest; and with the indulgence of the Senate I will read a single passage. It is a pamphlet prepared under the direction of the company, which has been examined by its engineer and indorsed by him as being correct and as certainly not exceeding the reality.

"What, now, is the extent of this liability, and how fast will it be incurred?"

Which is certainly a very pregnant question, and deserving of our consideration.

"To a certain extent, this will depend upon the rapidity with which the road shall be constructed. Supposing that one hundred and fifty miles upon the eastern end be finished at the close of the year 1868, one hundred more on the eastern and fifty on the western end in 1869, and the same in 1870, making five hundred miles before the 1st of January, 1871; and after that time one hundred and fifty miles upon the eastern and fifty miles on the western end annually until the last year, when three hundred miles will remain to be built, the road may be constructed in ten years, the time prescribed by the charter. Taking this estimate as a basis, the following figures will show the amount of stock upon which the guarantee of the Government for interest will attach, and the amount of interest for the period of thirty years: Fifty miles eastern end, 1867, at $24,900, equal to $1,245,000; interest, $74,700. One hundred miles eastern end, 1868, at $24,900, equal to $2,490,000. Total, $3,735,000; interest, $224,100."

And so the table proceeds from year to year through to the year 1877, showing that the whole amount of stock, the interest upon which is to be guaranteed, according to this bill, will not exceed the sum of $95,710,000; and that the whole amount of interest accruing during that period, and for which the Government will be liable, is only the sum of $19,836,800. From and after that time, that is the end of the ten years, of course it will be impossible for this interest to increase. On the other hand, it would necessarily be diminished from year to year by the payment into the Treasury of the proceeds of the lands lying upon the south side of their route and by the twenty-five per cent. of the net earnings of the road, which, by the bill, are to be appropriated to the repayment of this interest on the completion of the road. Of course, it is not possible to make out an accurate and precise statement of the entire amount of Government liability under this bill, for the location of the road has not yet been fixed. We do not know exactly what is to be its length; and it is impossible, from the nature of the case, to come at a perfectly correct conclusion as to the amount which we shall be compelled to pay in the end; but, in my humble judgment, it is not at all probable that at any time the Government will be called upon to pay more than four or five or six million dollars in any year during the existence of this loan; and I think, on a careful examination of the data which have come within my reach, there is really no risk in the Government assuming the payment of this interest; but that, on the other hand, the Government will in the end be a great gainer, as will the people of the United States, because it will have the effect to press forward settlement and enterprise into those remote regions. It will have an immediate effect to develop and bring to light the rich mineral treasures which are now resting concealed beneath the soil of the Territories of Idaho, Montana, and Washington, through which this road will pass. In every point of view in which I am able to view, I think it a very necessary measure, and am quite sure that in the end Congress will find itself constrained to pass the bill, or some bill of this kind, to aid this company in the construction of this great work. As matters are now situated, as I remarked before, it is totally impossible for the company to raise money by loan in the markets and equally impracticable, for them to sell their lands to such an extent as to enable them to go on with the work. I hope, sir, the Senate will take an intelligent, reasonable view of this matter and pass this bill.

Mr. SHERMAN. Mr. President, I do not wish to prolong this discussion; but a further examination of this bill and some statements made by the Senator from Michigan induce me to reply very briefly to him. I find in the statutes of two years ago two railroad laws; one of them for the building of the Union Pacific railroad, which was an amendment to the law passed two years before that, and intended to give to the Union Pacific railroad increased facilities. Those facilities were granted, not by an additional guarantee by the Government, but by a provision in the law which authorized the company to issue their bonds to bear date prior to and of a higher lien than the liability to the United States. The second bill was a bill to incorporate the Northern Pacific Railroad Company. These two bills are framed upon an entirely different theory. One bill provides for a direct grant of money or bonds by the United States to the Union Pacific Railroad Company in addition to the ordinary land grants, and to the construction of this road the credit of the United States was pledged to the amount of about ninety million dollars, all told, including all the various branches; so that the utmost liability of the United States for the Union Pacific railroad, according to the estimated distance then before us, and all its branches, including three in the East and one in the West, was about ninety-eight million dollars. At the same time, and the two laws are here together, passing together at the same time—the bill to organize and incorporate the Northern Pacific railroad, instead of granting—

Mr. HOWARD. The Senator cannot have forgotten that the Union Pacific railroad bill was passed in 1862.

Mr. SHERMAN. I have already stated that. The Senator will find that I am not mistaken.

Mr. HOWARD. The Senator is speaking of the two measures as being contemporaneous. In that he is certainly mistaken.

Mr. SHERMAN. I have already stated that the original Union Pacific railroad act was passed in 1862. The second one, which gave further relief, was passed in 1864.

Mr. HOWARD. The amendatory act.

Mr. SHERMAN. The amendatory act upon which we are now acting.

Mr. HOWARD. But the amendatory act did not grant any additional subsidy.

Mr. SHERMAN. I have already stated that. If the Senator will listen, he will find that I am correct in my statement. The first road, the Union Pacific railroad, was to be built by a grant of bonds to the road directly, amounting in the aggregate to $98,000,000, while the other railroad was to be built by a grant of lands. There is an entirely different frame-work for the two bills. One is an ordinary railroad grant; but the grant was given forty miles wide, running through the whole country along our northern border. The grant to the Northern Pacific railroad is larger than the States of Ohio and Indiana combined. It is as large as New England. If I have figured it up correctly, and I believe I have the precise quantity, it is forty-seven million acres of the public lands—a larger grant of land than has ever been given to any corporation in this country, or that was ever conceived to be given to any corporation, lying along a region that is fertile; according to the gentlemen who are engaged in the construction of this road, a region of land that is immensely valuable, and when they reach the Pacific coast in a climate that is very agreeable indeed. At the time the bill was passed, the gentlemen who were engaged in it said that they would build up this road as they went along with this increased grant of land, that they asked no money from the Government of the United States; and that stipulation was put in the body of the act in the nature of a condition precedent, upon which the grant was given. I will read that provision:

"Provided further, That no money shall be drawn from the Treasury of the United States to aid in the construction of the said Northern Pacific railroad."

Here were the two laws; here were the two railroads, one with a large grant of land, without any Government directors, to be managed by private enterprise, framed upon the ordinary basis of a land-grant road; and the other a Government road, to be aided by Government bonds, with Government directors, with Government agents, with Government commissioners, and the whole managed and controlled by the Government, and within the power of the Government at any moment; the one with an express stipulation that no money should be granted; the other with an express grant of money, and postponing the payment of the grant to a prior mortgage by the railroad company. These are the two laws; the map shows very clearly that the one railroad must creep along the northern boundary of this country. It must be, according to the terms of the bill, north of the forty-fifth degree of latitude; and if Senators will look at the map they will see from the course of the streams, from the course of the surveys, without any engineering at all, that it must go up as high as the forty-eighth degree of latitude; and, according to the surveys in the book which my friend from Michigan has before him, it is admitted that this road will lie between the forty-seventh and forty-eighth latitude, and occasionally probably crossing the Canada line.

Mr. McDUGALL. Let me ask the Senator a single question: whether it would not be well to improve our frontiers?

Mr. SHERMAN. It is proposed to run along our northern frontier until the western terminus is reached on British Puget sound.

Mr. McDUGALL. That is not British, but American.

Mr. SHERMAN. It is British in one sense, because its outlet, Vancouver's Island, is British soil. This road is to run along our northern boundary, and the Hudson's Bay Company is just as much interested in its construction as we are. These men have embarked in the enterprise, have built a portion of the road; and now what is the modest proposition made to us at this period of the session? They do not surrender their land grant; they do not propose to take their road upon the same stipulations, conditions, and limitations as the Union Pacific railroad, with Government directors and Government agents; but they ask us now to appropriate, what? Nearly twice as much in money as is granted to the same length of line in the Union Pacific railroad. It astonishes me to see this proposition made. The grant to the Union Pacific railroad is $16,000 a mile; for a portion of the road it is $32,000 a mile; and for three hundred miles only it is $48,000 a mile. That $48,000 a mile is only allowed for three hundred miles in the mountains, where there will be probably tunneling; but for the great body of the road the grant is only $16,000, or $32,000 a mile. Now, what is proposed to be given to this railroad which has already been enriched by an enormous grant of lands? For five hundred and twenty miles $98,900 a mile, more than twice the amount per mile, and for nearly twice the number of miles granted to the Union Pacific railroad. Again, for another large portion of it, consisting of three hundred and twenty miles, it is proposed to grant $57,000 a mile; for six hundred and twenty miles, $82,000 a mile; for three hundred and fifty miles, $57,000 a mile, making more than twice the rate granted to the Union Pacific; and for the distance over the prairie, where it is confessed it can be easily built, the grant of guaranteed stock amounts to $24,900 a mile, while the allowance to the Union Pacific is only $16,000 a mile; so that it is proposed to grant to this company at this session—a company that was organized upon the express stipulation that there should be no money aid—more than twice as much per mile, on the average, as is granted to the Union Pacific, in addition to twice the quantity of land, and that to run a line along our northern border, which Canadian and British interests are likely to control. It seems to me that ought to be sufficient to dispose of this whole matter.

But there are other objections to this bill. It introduces, for the first time, into our financial history, so far as I know, a guarantee of the stock of a private railroad. This is a private enterprise, controlled by private interests, managed by private directors, with no stipulation except that three fourths of them shall be citizens of the United States, and managed for private interests. The Government of the United States has no power over this road. It has no directors or agents in the road. The original bill did not contemplate that the Government should take any care or guardianship of its financial interests; the only protection it had was that the land grant was only to be as they proceeded with the road; it contemplated no grant of money; and now it is proposed, without giving the Government any power over the road, any Government directors or any agents connected with the road, to give this company this enormous grant of money and to introduce into our system of finance a new guarantee. It does seem to me that we have got enough financial securities in the market now; we have got some twenty or thirty different kinds; but here is a proposition to guarantee the interest on the stock of a private company over which we have no control whatever, and that to these enormous amounts.

My honorable friend says that this guarantee does not amount to anything, because the company will pay the interest itself. It is not bound to pay a dollar of it until the road is completed. By the very stipulations of this bill they have ten years to complete this road, and, if necessary, we know how easy it will be to get an extension of the time; but they are not bound to pay back one dollar of this interest until the road is completed. Here we may be going on paying interest on this stock guaranteed by us, over which we have no control, for ten years, without any stipulation by them to repay it; and when they repay it, do they give us back interest on our interest? Not at all; they only give us back the principal sum that we have paid. The idea that this railroad company will step forward at any period within twenty years and assume the payment of this interest is preposterous, it is idle.

Sir, if this grant is made this railroad will be built, and it will be the first built in this country. The guarantee of stock will more than build this railroad. I would pledge all I am worth in this world that I could take this guarantee and with two thirds of the amount thus given to the company build the road, if we can believe one half what is said by the surveyors. They admit themselves that two thirds of the distance is over a level plain, over a rich country, with more timber and coal and with more facilities to build a railroad than on the Union Pacific line; and that on account of the break in the spurs of the mountains the difficulties there are not so great. I say with this amount of money, reduced to the gold standard—and we must expect before these ten years go round to come back to a gold standard or all break up—with this amount in gold, two thirds of it, the road will be built. Before the war broke out railroads in Iowa and in my State were built at from sixteen thousand to twenty-five thousand dollars a mile, and in Illinois they were built for less than that. Many of the roads on the western plains were actually equipped, completed, and run for $20,000 a mile. In this bill the guarantee of stock for the easiest portion of the road, where the country is level, is $24,900, and in the most expensive portion, for the distance of six hundred miles, $98,900; a cost greater than the cost of many of the Pennsylvania roads where they must creep along the spurs of the mountains all the way.

Now, sir, I say it is unwise legislation for us to attempt to pass this bill at this stage of the session, or indeed at any other stage. We have already involved the credit of the Government in the construction of one Pacific railroad, and our bonds are being issued daily for that purpose. I believe, myself, that this railroad can and will be built upon the land grant. I do not think the gentlemen interested in this road ought to come here and ask us to grant money to aid in the construction of this road. It is a violation of the stipulations upon which the grant was made to them, and it is neither reasonable nor right that they should seek to vary the contract. When they talk to us about giving security for the repayment of this money, pray what security is it? To give us a mortgage upon one half of our own lands; to give us a mortgage on the excess of that which they got over the other grant to the Union Pacific railroad. How idle and ridiculous! And then there is no power in the United States to compel this company to sell this land.

Mr. HOWARD. The Senator certainly cannot be ignorant of the fact that both the charter and the bill now under consideration contain a clause authorizing Congress at any time to alter, amend, or repeal the respective acts at any moment.

Mr. SHERMAN. I know that; but does not the Senator know very well that when we have made a bargain a sense of honor and good faith always prevents us from availing ourselves of that right, except to prevent some great wrong? If the company simply goes on and pursues its part of this stipulation, the company need never fear that Congress will violate its contract. I say that the contract itself is improvident in its terms, giving to this company a subsidy of an unreasonable amount.

Mr. McDOUGALL. If the Senator will allow me, I wish to make a single remark. I wish to observe that the Government does not make contracts in these matters; they make grants; and if a grant is not sufficient for the object, they may give an additional grant. It is not in the nature of a contract between man and man. That is the difference between the two propositions.

Mr. SHERMAN. I have no doubt that this is a grant; and it is because it is a most excessive and unreasonable grant, as I think, that I oppose it.

There is another consideration. I said before that the line of this road is along the British possessions. The British Government is now endeavoring to divert the whole transit across this continent on to what is called the Grand Trunk railroad and the lines through Canada West. I see in a recent publication a statement that they have already contemplated—and perhaps have made surveys—the construction of a railroad as far as the Lake of the Woods, where they propose to connect with this Northern Pacific railroad; and it was an absolute fact that British capitalists had at one time the control of this enormous grant of our land twenty miles wide through the whole northern boundary. What is there in this bill to prevent these Canadian interests, controlling a large amount of money, from buying up the guaranteed stock of the United States issued to this road, guaranteeing an interest of six per cent.? What is there to prevent British capitalists from entering into the market and buying up this stock and thus controlling and owning not only a strip of land twenty miles wide through our whole country, but the franchise which compels the Government of the United States to pay an annuity to them of over six million dollars, and with that money to build a road to promote Canadian interests? Why, sir, they will do it as sure as this bill shall become a law. Puget sound is their natural terminus. That is not the natural terminus of our Pacific coast trade. Portland is the capital of Oregon, and the mouth of the Columbia river is the place where the interests about Oregon concentrate. In California they concentrate at San Francisco. Now, it is proposed by this enormous grant to build up a new rival interest on the western slope in the British possessions at Vancouver's Island where they may control the trade of the world, where they may seek to divert from California and Oregon this magnificent trade, gather it into a British port, taking it over a British road, subsidized by the national Government, to Montreal and the mouth of the St. Lawrence. Is that the purpose for which we should legislate now? I say it is not. In every sense in which I can look at this bill I think it is an improvident measure. I trust the Senate will recommit it or let it go over until next winter. No great harm can be done by the postponement; and I think that after this session we shall never hear of this bill in this form again.

Mr. McDOUGALL. Mr. President, there is no rivalry between the port of San Francisco and a line of road from the central part of the Union to the bay of San Francisco, and a northern line to Puget sound. There would be no rivalry as between them and a line of road down on our southern lines. The terminus of the line of road now proposed will be eight hundred miles north of the terminus of the Union Pacific road. It was my opportunity fourteen years ago to present the first bill in the House of Representatives for a Pacific railroad. Before that time I had studied the subject with great care, and had gone over three lines of this continent somewhat with reference to that same enterprise. The bill introduced and reported by the committee in the House of Representatives involved three lines, this northern line, the central line, and a southern line. It was thought that the interests of the Republic—not merely commercial interests, but great political interests—were involved in all those communications. It was thought that economy on the part of the Government was involved in them. I think I then demonstrated clearly that economy on the part of the Government was involved in the construction of them all on the terms then proposed. I came into the House of Representatives on purpose to urge that railroad communication; and I came to this Senate of the United States for the particular purpose of again urging upon Congress to establish this communication. When the measure I had the honor to introduce had become a law, and it possessed vitality, I surrendered it to other and abler men, or at least if I did not surrender it, it was usurped from me.

When the bill to which this is an addendum was introduced, I regretted that it had not sufficiency enough in its provisions to achieve the result. I said to gentlemen who were in favor of the northern road, who came to see me about it, "Gentlemen, I am in favor of building that road, but this bill will not accomplish it; it is not strong enough; it has not got material enough in it to induce enterprise and command capital." I was pleased to see this measure come in here with strength enough to achieve so important a result. The wealth to the individual is the wealth to the nation. What will be built up on the line of this road will multiply the wealth of the Republic fifty times her investment. These things are not well considered, and some gentlemen have a habit of discussing these great public enterprises as if they were in a banking house, and taking bonds, mortgages, or indorsed notes. That is not the way great Governments transact great affairs; and it is against large policies that tend to large development and make the strength of nations.

When you run a line of road along our northern frontier to Puget sound, there is one of the most beautiful waters in the world. All the navies of the world could ride there at rest. It is our own land. It does not belong to Queen Victoria. Vancouver's Island lying across there, the boys could take any time, if they chose; but we do not want any controversy of that kind. There is a little quarrel about the island of San Juan which is not yet settled; but so far as the terminus of this road on the west is concerned, it is in American territory, and one of the most beautiful countries in the world. As to running along the line of the British possessions, as a matter of military policy, it would be sound within our own lines; and then, as to British capital going into the enterprise, I hope it may. They cannot hurt us by helping our own enterprises and building up our own country. The time is not far distant—we all know it—when those possessions will be ours by the common consent of States. What is the objection, then, to English capital coming in to aid this enterprise?

I understand the objection of the Senator from Ohio. There is a system of railroads in his part of the country, and he thinks the railroads of Canada in connection with this will carry off a portion of their trade. That is not a general, public reason; it is a local and personal one. We cannot do a better thing, in my judgment, than to pass a bill that will secure the connection of our country over our own soil with our northwest frontier by rail, and we should also have a rail down to our Southwest, and then with a rail along our coast, we could maintain at least the Austrian Quadrilateral. I say this bill should be passed, and there is no conflict between the Union Pacific and the Northern Pacific railroad.

Mr. MORGAN. Mr. President, I cannot vote for this bill. I shall vote to recommit it, if such a motion is made. I look forward to the time when there will be a Northern Pacific railroad and a Southern Pacific railroad in addition to the Union Pacific railroad already established; but I think this money application made at this time is one that should not be granted. A little more than two years ago Congress made a very liberal appropriation for the construction of the Union Pacific railroad. The whole appropriation, if I recollect aright, was not far from $100,000,000. They also made appropriations to various roads in Kansas. In regard to those roads in Kansas, I think we have committed an error. I think it would have been better to have fixed the starting point and the point of termination for the Pacific railroad as one grand railroad, and to that Congress should have made appropriations, and let all other competing lines run into the main trunk. But it is too late to correct that now, and we made, as I have stated, this large appropriation. I remember very well that it was considered a great step for Congress to take. I remember very well the remarks made by the Senator now dead from Vermont, Judge Collamer, who was a member of the Pacific Railroad Committee, in which he expressed great fears that Congress was going too far.

At a time a little subsequent to that we created another corporation and we made a grant to certain individuals for the Northern Pacific railroad, under the expectation, as has been stated by the Senator from Ohio, that there would be no money required from the Government and therefore a very large appropriation of lands was made; I think forty-seven million acres. The persons to whom that grant was made were not able to succeed with it, and it finally fell into the hands of a gentleman of the State of Maine by the name of Perham, known as Gift Enterprise Perham. He was not able to go through with it; he was not able to carry it on; and he disposed of it last winter to some gentlemen, I believe, for the sum of $50,000, and those gentlemen now come in and ask Congress to make an appropriation of about one hundred million dollars. I am a little surprised at such an application. I think it is the most extraordinary application that was ever made to Congress, taking all the circumstances into consideration. The original grant of lands, as has been stated by the Senator from Ohio, was much larger than had ever been given before to any railroad company, and that was given under the expectation, perhaps under the promise, that there would be no further application. I do not know that we can ever prevent these applications from being made, but I shall not be at all surprised if, for the very road we have granted this session, called the Smoky Hill road, we shall, at an early day, have an application for money.

The Senator from Michigan expressed his surprise that the Senator from Ohio had opposed this bill. I, on the contrary, feel like expressing my obligations to the Senator from Ohio for the opposition that he has made to it. I hope, sir, that it will not be passed.

Mr. WILLIAMS obtained the floor.

Mr. HOWARD. I beg the Senator from Oregon to yield me the floor for one moment. The Senator from Ohio made one statement to which I wish to call his attention. If I understood him rightly, he said that the liabilities of the Government, in the shape of Government bonds granted or to be granted to the Union Pacific railroad and its several branches, would amount to $98,000,000. Did I understand the Senator correctly?

Mr. SHERMAN. That, I believe, is the estimate, from ninety-five to ninety-eight million dollars.

Mr. HOWARD. I wish to inquire of the Senator whether he does not include in that estimate the value of the lands granted.

Mr. SHERMAN. No, sir.

Mr. HOWARD. I think the Senator must include the lands.

Mr. SHERMAN. I include all the bonds granted to the Union Pacific and to the Leavenworth branch, the Sioux City branch, and all its branches. I do not feel perfectly confident about it, but I think it is about ninety-eight million dollars.

Mr. HOWARD. My impression is that the Senator from Ohio must have included the value of the lands in that estimate. Now, let me call his attention to some facts and figures. Suppose the line to be eighteen hundred miles long from the one hundredth meridian of longitude to the ocean. The grant, according to the terms of the charter, being $16,000 to the mile, except in the mountain districts where the grant is $48,000 per mile in bonds, the whole amount of bonds—and this is including the three branches at the East, estimating the length of each branch at one hundred miles—to be issued to that company and its branches will not exceed forty-eight million dollars. If to this we add for California, which has two sections, one mountainous and the other not, the share of bonds which would fall to the California Central, we have the total of $57,120,000 in Government bonds to be issued to the Union Pacific railroad and all its branches.

Mr. SHERMAN. There is a statement on file—it just occurred to me, and I have sent for it—made by Colonel Simpson recently, in which he gives the entire distance at about twenty-two hundred miles for the railroad and its branches; three hundred miles at $48,000 a mile, and perhaps a thousand at $32,000. There are three different grades of road. I can show you the precise statement. I think it is $98,000,000.

Mr. HOWARD. I think whoever has made such a statement must have made an overestimate. I do not think the liabilities of the Government on account of these roads will exceed $57,000,000 for the bonds which it will be required to issue. But if we admit that the statement of the Senator is correct as to the amount of bonds thus to be issued, and that that amount is $98,000,000, he will see that at the end of thirty years, during which we are to pay the interest at six per cent., if we never get anything back from those companies, the liability of the United States will be at least $175,000,000 for interest, to which must be added the $98,000,000 of principal which we are to issue in favor of those companies. The difference, it will be seen, is very great. I must think that the basis of the Senator's estimate is in some way vicious, as he will discover.

Mr. SHERMAN. I have examined the law, and there is no doubt of one thing, of our liability under this bill to guaranty a principal sum of stock of $102,143,000 for twenty years. The amount we pay under this bill, at the lowest estimate possible, is $122,571,600. There is no doubt about the amount in this case, at any rate.

Mr. HOWARD. Upon the assumption that the company will never pay back again, either in the shape of the proceeds of the lands, or by way of transportation upon its road, or by way of the twenty-five per cent. of its net earnings, after it shall have completed its road. That is not exactly a fair way to state any question, according to my judgment. It omits the most important elements that belong to it.

Mr. WILLIAMS. Mr. President, I do not propose to protract this discussion, as I know the Senate is very impatient for a vote upon the question; but two or three objections have been made to the passage of this bill that it seems to me deserve to be noted. One, upon which the Senator from Ohio particularly relies is, that if this appropriation is made to the road there is great danger that the company may sell it to some company organized in Canada and under the laws of Great Britain, so that this work may be transferred to the control of the subjects of the British Government. In the first place, I answer that objection by saying that it is extremely improbable that American citizens—and this bill requires that three fourths of the directors of this company shall be American citizens—would transfer a great work like this, connecting the two oceans, to the control of the subjects of Great Britain.

Mr. STEWART. I will inquire of the Senator if he thinks that English capital would be very ready to go into this enterprise with a view of using it adversely to the United States, with this provision in the bill that Congress may repeal or modify the law at any time.

Mr. WILLIAMS. I was about to add to the reason that I had just assigned that Congress has the power to amend, alter, or repeal the original charter at any time; so that if the company, in case this appropriation is made, should undertake to put the road under the control of the citizens of Canada, Congress has the power at any time to take away this charter.

Mr. SHERMAN. I will ask my friend whether he thinks Congress could repeal a guarantee. After the bonds or stock were issued, could Congress then, by repealing the guarantee, refuse to comply with the stipulations of that guarantee printed on the back of the stock? Suppose a transfer is made ten years afterward, about the time the road is completed, and after the stock has been all issued and thousands of people interested, could the Government of the United States then, by repealing the charter, refuse to pay the guarantee of the interest on this stock? Certainly not.

Mr. WILLIAMS. I suppose that if a charter is granted by Congress to a company, and the charter declares that Congress at any time shall have the power to alter, amend, or repeal that charter, any person who contracts with the persons so incorporated contracts with a view to that part of the charter, and it becomes a portion of the contract; and I say that Congress has at any time—

Mr. SHERMAN. Let me ask my friend a question. Suppose we pass a loan law, which is liable to be repealed at any time, and we issue thirty-year bonds on that loan law; I will ask the Senator whether, under those circumstances, we could not repudiate the bonds because we have a right to repeal the laws under which they were issued. Is not that precisely this case? Here the stock is issued under a law passed by us, which is repealable like all other laws, and we guaranty stock issued under that law. We are bound to make good that guarantee. Whatever the company may do, that guarantee is binding upon us, and the faith of the United States is pledged for the payment of that interest for twenty years. There can be no doubt of it.

Mr. HOWARD. Does the Senator from Ohio suppose that the repeal of the law would vitiate and annul such a contract?

Mr. SHERMAN. It is the Senator from Oregon who seems to think so.

Mr. HOWARD. I do not understand that to be the law at all.

Mr. SHERMAN. Nor do I.

Mr. WILLIAMS. I undertake to say that if this company undertakes to transfer the powers that it derives from Congress under this amendment to their charter to citizens of Canada, Congress may repeal the charter and may repeal this law, and so put an end to the enterprise and prevent and defeat the construction of this road in the United States. In that way Congress has the entire control of this subject, and there is no reason to apprehend that this company will, under such circumstances, put the control of this road into the hands of citizens of Canada. This argument, if it amounts to anything at all as an objection to this bill, is an argument that may be used with equal force against any act of Congress of a similar nature; for it is possible for any company and every company organized by Congress for any purpose, to transfer the control of its franchise and its powers and its privileges to citizens of Canada or of any other portion of the world; and it is only brought in here simply because this road runs along the northern boundary of the United States. This idea is brought forward as a mere matter of conjecture, and Congress is required to defeat a bill of this description and this magnitude, so necessary to the development of the country and to the commercial interests of the entire world, upon a possible contingency that is exceedingly improbable, as the Senator must admit.

The honorable Senator argues that the road is objectionable because it runs along the northern boundary of the United States. I, on the contrary, claim that that is one reason why the United States should with all possible expedition cause the construction of this road. There is a plan now in contemplation of confederating the different States and Provinces of Canada, and British capital is contemplating the construction of a work like this from the Atlantic to the Pacific ocean within the British possessions, and if the United States decline or refuse to construct this road at this time, the time is not far distant, I apprehend, when British capital will construct a road through the British possessions from Puget sound to the Atlantic ocean, and in that way will obtain the command of all the trade and commerce of that entire region of country. If this road is constructed the United States will obtain the control of all the trade of that region of country both in the British possessions and in the United States. The vast valley of the Saskatchewan, the Red river valley, the Assiniboin valley, and many other extensive valleys in the British possessions that are rich and populous will be made tributary to this thoroughfare through the United States, and all that portion of the British possessions lying contiguous to the northern boundary of the United States will be made tributary to the United States and to this road. I think, therefore, that it is for the manifest welfare of the country that this road should be constructed, and that the British possessions should be made tributary in that way to the United States, rather than this entire northern country be made tributary to the British possessions. This road traverses a vast region of country, a country that would make seven or eight or ten States as large as Pennsylvania, traveling through Minnesota, Dakota, Idaho, Montana, and Washington to Puget sound, and its construction would tend to the development of the agricultural and mineral resources of that country, and in an indirect way it would more than compensate the United States for all that it might expend in the construction of the road or become liable to expend if this bill should become a law.

The Senator from Ohio has presented an imposing array of figures here for the purpose of frightening the Senate from a favorable consideration of this bill; and he argues that the United States by the passage of this law becomes liable to pay $100,000,000. That argument is just as sound as it would be if the Senator was to argue that the Government of the United States should cease all its operations because at the end of twenty years the expenses of governing the nation would be $2,000,000,000 without taking into the account at all whatever the Government might receive during that time for the purpose of defraying those expenses.

The Senator says that there was a solemn promise when the original act was passed that no application should be made for money. I know not what promise was given. I do not know what individual or individuals had power to make such a promise or such a pledge. I have no doubt that it was the expectation at that time of everybody connected with this enterprise that an appropriation of this amount of lands would enable the company to construct the road; but after an effort of two years these lands have been found unavailable for that purpose, and the question is now submitted to Congress as to whether or not it will abandon this magnificent work, give it up altogether, surrender any effort to develop the resources of this vast country by the construction of such a road, or whether Congress will lend simply its credit to the enterprise in order to accomplish its speedy completion. That is the simple question. Is it wiser and better for Congress at this time to abandon the enterprise because it has been ascertained that this work cannot be constructed by the use of the lands at this time, and there is no other way in which this company can proceed except by this assistance, this credit which it asks at the hands of Congress?

It is perfectly apparent that these lands cannot be made in their present situation to build this road. What were the prairie lands of the State of Illinois worth in the interior of that State—lands that are now exceedingly valuable—before there was any railroad constructed in the State of Illinois? What were the lands in the western part of Iowa and Missouri, removed from the navigable waters of those States, worth before there were railroad lines connecting those lands with some commercial thoroughfare in the country? These lands lying in Minnesota, in Montana, and in Idaho would be rich and productive lands if they could be cultivated; but now, when there are no means of access to them, they are worth little or nothing; they would produce nothing of any value to the individual; they would produce nothing of any value to the country; but build to them a railroad and then they become valuable; then they can be sold; then they will produce an income. But you cannot now go into the market with these lands and sell them to a man or to a company for any considerable amount. Nobody desires to invest money in lands so remotely removed from all possible connection with the commercial centers and channels of the country, without some probability that there will be a railroad or some means of connection constructed between the northern lakes or the lakes or railroads of the country and these valuable lands.

Now, sir, this has been ascertained, as I understand, that these lands cannot be made available; but this bill proposes that this company shall proceed, in the first place, and construct twenty-five miles of road without any assistance whatever from the Government, by the use of private capital. When the twenty-five miles of road are constructed, then the Government is asked to guaranty the interest upon the stock of the company to the amount of twenty-odd thousand dollars per mile from the date of its issue. The Government does not guaranty the payment of the stock, as the gentleman seems to imply, if he does not directly assert, but the Government simply guaranties the payment of the interest at six per cent. upon that stock; and the gentleman argues that in this way millions of indebtedness will accumulate against the United States. This company proposes, as security to the Government for this guarantee of interest upon the stock, to mortgage to the United States all the lands lying on the south side of the road, amounting to twenty sections per mile, more than has been donated, as the gentleman says, to the Union Pacific railroad. All these lands are to be applied to the payment of the interest upon this stock in case the Government is compelled to pay any portion of that interest. Now, here are twelve thousand eight hundred acres per mile of land that is to be applied, in the first place, to pay the interest upon the stock issued, which the Government guaranties, for each mile of this road. Anybody can see at a glance that that land of itself, assuming that it is worth anything at all, that it is worth the price for which the public lands of the United States sell—the proceeds of those lands will be sufficient to pay the interest which the Government would have to pay upon the stock that it might guaranty for each mile.

Then, again, when this road is constructed, after the expiration of ten years, within which time it is to be completed, one fourth of the net proceeds of the road is to be applied to the liquidation of any claim which the Government may have for interest advanced upon this stock. Now, supposing that the interest accumulates, that nothing whatever is received from the sale of these lands during the ten years—and that is not a reasonable supposition at all—at the end of ten years the entire interest per annum upon the amount that the Government will guaranty according to the terms of this bill will be about five million dollars per annum.

Now, Mr. President, I will ask the Senator if it is unreasonable to suppose, in case the road is constructed, that the net earnings of it will be $16,000,000. I understand that the Pennsylvania Central in 1865 earned thirty-odd million dollars. It is not reasonable to suppose that the net earnings of this road, constructed from Puget sound to Lake Superior, would be $20,000,000? And a quarter of that, $5,000,000, is to be paid every year to the Treasury of the United States in case there be any claim remaining there for the interest advanced on this stock. Here you have the land lying on the south side of this road, one half of the munificent grant made by the United States to this company, half of the lands appropriated simply to the payment of the interest upon the stock, and then you have one fourth of the net earnings of the road pledged. You pay nothing but the interest; there is no liability for the principal of the stock; and here is this vast amount of land and here is one fourth of the proceeds of this road pledged to the payment of the interest. So it does seem to me that there is no probability at all that the Government will be compelled to pay one cent which is not reimbursed to us under these provisions of this bill.

This is simply the Government loaning to this company its credit; it simply becomes an indorser of the stock. The company will pay the interest if it can. The simple object of this is to enable the company to negotiate its stock and raise the necessary money. Every man knows that railroads cannot be constructed in this country unless the road be mortgaged or bonds be given, unless some means are employed for raising money. What other way can this road adopt unless it be to have some guarantee of this description? Should the company apply to an individual to subscribe ten thousand or fifty thousand dollars for the construction of this road, that individual may not wish to invest his money because he does not know that other persons enough will take the balance of the stock so as to make the road a success; and if it is a failure, whatever he contributes in that way is lost to him; and so it is impossible to bring persons enough to agree to contribute capital enough by taking stock to make the road a certainty, to make its success a certainty, and each individual stands back, is unwilling to put forward his capital in this enterprise because he apprehends that there will not be capital raised elsewhere, put with his capital, to construct and finish the road; but whenever the Government guarantees the interest, men are willing to contribute their capital for this purpose, and the construction of the road becomes a certainty, a success.

Mr. President, I am taxing the patience of the Senate, and I will not say more.

Mr. CRAGIN. Mr. President, I did desire to make some remarks upon this bill; but the day is so oppressive here and the Senate so anxious to terminate the debate, that I will not attempt to detain the Senate but a very short time in any discussion. And sir, but for the extraordinary, as it seems to me, opposition to this bill, I would content myself with not saying anything whatever.

The gentlemen who oppose this bill assume that the Government is to pay $122,000,000 of interest on the stock guaranteed to this road and never to receive a dollar back. That assumption, in my judgment, is unreasonable and unwarranted by anything contained in this bill. If gentlemen will consult this bill and will make figures, they will find that at the end of ten years, when this road is to be constructed, the Government cannot possibly have advanced over about nineteen million dollars as interest, and in that time the land will have been sold to pay those nineteen million dollars. After the road is completed then twenty-five per cent. of the net earnings are to be paid into the Treasury of the United States. But the Senator from Ohio tells us that the Government of the United States is to pay one hundred and twenty-two millions. Why, it will have advanced only nineteen millions up to the day that this road is constructed and running; and then twenty-five per cent. of the net earnings are to go into the Treasury of the United States. Is there a sensible man in this body who believes that after that day the Government will advance one single dollar more than it receives from the net earnings? If there is, I much misapprehend the meaning of this bill.

The gentleman says that the land grant to this road is sufficient to build it, and yet he says that this company offers no security to the Government for the contemplated aid. If the land grant is sufficient to build the road, half the land certainly is some security. I believe that the value of the lands granted to this road is sufficient to build the road, but they cannot now be made available, they cannot be sold. By this bill the company is to build twenty-five miles of road, put in its own money, and then the Government is to guaranty the stock of the road to a certain amount.

Mr. HOWARD. On that particular section.

Mr. CRAGIN. On that particular section, and so on as it advances, and the moment the road begins to be built then the land will begin to be valuable and to be sold, and the proceeds of the lands on the south side will, as they are sold, go into the Treasury of the United States; and my own belief is here to-day that if this bill passes the Government of the United States will never advance $5,000,000 to this company that they do not repay instantly. Up to 1871, it is estimated that the Government will advance about a million and a half dollars. By that time the lands will be selling, and the amount of the Government advance will be constantly reduced by this means; but if the lands should not be sufficient at the end of ten years, when the Government has advanced only about nineteen millions, as I remarked before, then comes in twenty-five per cent. of the net earnings of the road; and after that day, I repeat, in my judgment, the Government will never advance a single dollar.

Mr. HOWE. Allow me to ask the Senator a question. I have not examined this bill very carefully; but I perceive the Senator says that twenty-five per cent. of the net earnings, after the road is built, is to be paid into the Treasury of the United States. I suppose that is in liquidation of the interest.

Mr. CRAGIN. Certainly.

Mr. HOWE. What is to become of the other seventy-five per cent.?

Mr. CRAGIN. That goes to the company, I suppose.

Mr. HOWE. Is it supposed, then, that the company will expend three times as much in the construction of this road as the Government is asked to guaranty?

Mr. CRAGIN. It is estimated that the road will cost at least $150,000,000, and they estimate this guarantee from the Government at about twenty-five millions, as I understand; and in order to make the Government perfectly secure and safe, in addition to mortgaging practically one half of the lands, the bill provides that if the lands do not reimburse the Government for this payment of interest twenty-five per cent. of the net earnings of the road shall be paid until the liquidation is complete.

Mr. HOWE. Now let me see if I understand the Senator. Do I understand his statement to be that the road will cost $150,000,000?

Mr. CRAGIN. That is the estimate.

Mr. HOWE. Of that $150,000,000 the Government is asked to guaranty the interest on $95,000,000, which would leave the expenditure to be made by the company $55,000,000. Then is it the operation of the bill to give them seventy-five per cent. of the net earnings to apply on $55,000,000 of expenditure, while the Government has twenty-five per cent. to apply on $95,000,000?

Mr. CRAGIN. The bill makes no provision in reference to that. That is merely an inference. All this time the lands are being sold.

Mr. RAMSEY. The anticipation is that the twenty-five per cent. will never be called for, that the land in the mean time will pay all the Government guaranties.

Mr. CRAGIN. I believe that the gentlemen who oppose this bill have unfairly stated the case. They have taken the figures at the very highest amount possible, and the Senator from Ohio, placing the guarantee at $122,000,000, treats it as though the Government was never to receive one cent back, and in his comparison he makes it out that by this bill we are granting much more aid to this road pecuniarily than was granted to the Union Pacific railroad and its branches. He says that Congress has now granted to the Union Pacific railroad and its branches about ninety-eight million dollars. This he admits as simply the principal of the bonds, and yet the interest on those bonds added would more than equal the interest which is contemplated by this bill and make a total sum of $272,000,000.

The Senator from Ohio also brings up another objection. He greatly fears this road is to fall into the hands of British capitalists, and for that reason he is opposed to the bill. It was mainly on this point that I rose to make a single remark. It happens that I am personally acquainted with nearly all the directors and managers of this road. I know them to be personally the ablest railroad men in the eastern part of this Union, and men of undoubted integrity and ability, and I have not the slightest apprehension that they would in any way be parties to any fraud of that kind. If this aid is granted they mean in good faith to build the road. That is their purpose. They are men of energy, and they wish to succeed in this enterprise. And, sir, is it a new thing in this body to hear about foreign aid? Were we not told a short time ago that the Union Pacific Railroad Company had sent abroad agents to negotiate a mortgage upon its whole line to raise funds in Europe? Certainly that statement was made here; whether true or not I do not know.

Sir, I hope this bill will pass. I believe that the interests of the country demand it. I believe that the Government will be the gainer by granting this little aid which is contemplated by the bill, for I do not think it will amount to any great sum. If I did not believe that the Government would be reimbursed fully and completely for this guarantee of interest I certainly should not vote for the bill. I do not believe it. On the other hand I believe that the Government will be fully reimbursed; and not only that, I believe the building of this road will open up valuable portions of this country; I believe it will develop the resources of this country to a very great extent, and that the revenues of the country will be increased to a vast amount. Not only will the Government have a lien upon one half of these lands, but the other sections which are owned by the Government will be enhanced in value and will bring into the Treasury money which otherwise would not come there. I hope, sir, that this bill will pass.

Mr. RAMSEY. Mr. President, a brief statement will show how unsubstantial are the arguments in opposition to this bill. If the bill be passed it will require five years—until 1871—to complete from two hundred to three hundred miles of this road, and all the surveys, according to the estimate of the company; and in all that time the Treasury of the nation will be called upon to contribute but $1,700,000 to initiate this great work. The Senator from Ohio, who has arrayed himself in opposition to this bill admits that some day or other this work must be accomplished, and that it must be done by the aid of the Government, if not otherwise completed; he surely then will not persist in counseling the loss of five or six years, a period so momentous, as the last twenty years have shown us, in the development of new Territories, the enlargement of the boundaries of civilization, and the vast addition to the wealth and commerce of the world, for comparatively so insignificant a consideration.

Why, sir, the thorough survey of the continent on that line which this project will secure, and the two hundred or three hundred miles of road which it will construct, will be greatly more valuable than all the money we ask. You will get infinitely more than the worth of your money. As I speak so many advantages present themselves to my mind, the magnitude of the interests involved is so palpable, that I fear to enter upon the subject now would be to do injustice to the theme. But take a prosaic statement which alone will justify the passage of this bill. By making three hundred miles of road from the termination of Lake Superior westwardly, you reach the Red river country; and four hundred miles more bring you to the Missouri river. Thus by making seven hundred miles of railroad you connect twenty-five hundred miles of lake navigation with four hundred miles of navigation on the Missouri river, from Fort Union or Fort Berthole, into the heart of Montana, at Fort Benton, making nearly thirty-five hundred miles of a continuous line of steam communication by lake, river, and rail. Thus by making seven hundred miles of railroad you are brought into the very heart of the continent. The Missouri river from Fort Union to Fort Benton is navigable more months of the year than it is below that point, down toward the borders of Kansas and Nebraska. The navigation below is often indifferent, but from Fort Union westward to Fort Benton there is good navigation through almost all the usual months of navigation upon that river.

It must be remembered that your principal lines of railroad between the East and the West are now about the line of forty degrees. This line would be about the forty-fifth degree. Now, look at the great development that has already taken place in the country north of forty-five degrees. There is the Territory of Montana with already a population claimed to be, and I suppose it is, quite forty thousand people, producing about one quarter of all the gold product of this continent, assumed now to be about a hundred millions. That Territory, so rich in gold, is said to produce about twenty-five millions annually. Then you have the whole of the Territory of Washington, lying north of forty-five degrees. You have not as yet provided any accommodation for the travel and development of that extensive district of country in the North; you are confining your accommodations and your appropriations to about the line of forty degrees; and it is not reasonable to suppose that the country will be longer satisfied with such a discrimination. Need I say more? I have merely interjected topics for consideration, and facts which are irresistible, on which, if the hour were more opportune, I should with pleasure dilate. Pass this bill and the expenditures it may occasion will be well repaid.

Mr. SAULSBURY. Mr. President, the Senators from the extreme Northwest seem to take a great interest in this measure. Now, I should like to inquire of some one where Congress gets the authority to guaranty the stock of a private corporation, to guaranty that the stockholders shall be paid six per cent. upon their stock. I should like some of the advocates of this bill to point out the section and the article of the Constitution of the United States giving to Congress the power to guaranty the payment of interest upon the stock of a private corporation. I apprehend that such a thing as that has not been done in the past history of the country. It never occurred before to members of the Senate and House of Representatives that such a power was vested in the Congress of the United States; and in the advocacy of this measure, which may involve such a vast expenditure of money on the part of the General Government, no one of its advocates has presumed to refer to the Constitution of the United States as conferring this power upon Congress. They seem to assume that Congress has the power. Sir, it is only another evidence that in our legislation, that limitation upon the powers of Congress and the other departments of Government is totally unheeded, absolutely unthought of. If you have the power to guaranty the payment of six per cent. upon the stock of this railroad, you have the authority likewise to guaranty the payment of six per cent. upon the stock of every private railroad in the United States. If you can guaranty lawfully the payment of this interest upon the stock of this railroad, your power is the same in reference to every other railroad in the United States.

Mr. WILLIAMS. I wish to remind the Senator that this bill relates to a company incorporated by a law of Congress. I ask, if Congress has power to incorporate a company, may it not prescribe the regulations under which that company may transact its business?

Mr. SAULSBURY. I suppose that if Congress has the power to incorporate a company it may do everything necessary for that purpose, as the gentleman says; but that is a very different question from the one I am discussing. In the first place, it involves the question of the power of Congress to incorporate any such railroad company. To be sure, it might give a corporation authority to cross the public lands not within the limits of a State. But that is a totally different question from the power of Congress to take money out of the public Treasury to guaranty a debt owing to private individuals. I go further and say, if you have a right under the Constitution of the United States to guaranty the payment of six per cent. upon this stock, you have just as much right to guaranty the payment of six per cent. upon the bond of A to B. The fact that the interest arises upon stock of a railroad company makes no difference in reference to the authority of Congress. If you have the authority to guaranty the payment of a private debt when that debt is due by a corporation, although that corporation may be chartered by yourselves, you have the power to guaranty the payment of interest on the bond of A to B. Adopt this principle and the United States becomes the great guarantor of every private debt in the country. I do not say they would do it in practice, but the same principle is involved.

Now, Mr. President, is it not time for us to wake up to a proper consideration of our powers as legislators? It cannot be pleaded that we are in a time of war and that necessity, absolute necessity, overriding fundamental laws, requires such an appropriation of money as this, or such a guarantee as this. No such plea can now be available. Neither can the plea that this railroad will be greatly beneficial to the section of country through which it passes, and that it will be of great public use, be available here, because Congress has not authority to do any and everything which may be for the public good. It is time, I say, that we should go back to something like the original views of the founders of the Government and institute an inquiry, where do we get the power to do these extraordinary things? I have no prejudice against this Northern Pacific railroad more than I have against the other. I would just as lief see the one built as the other; but I hold that the Congress of the United States has no authority under the Constitution to pass this act. It has no authority to guaranty the payment of six per cent. upon the stock of any corporation in the United States. Unless that authority can be shown I think we ought to vote unanimously for the defeat of this bill.

Mr. FESSENDEN. My friend from Ohio is a very acute Senator, and therefore I have been very much surprised at the fact that he supposes that any array of figures showing that inevitably the United States must be the loser by embarking itself in any enterprise of this sort, would have an effect upon the Senate when they have a scheme to carry through. The fact that he should be so green as to entertain such a notion as that surprised me very much. I have hardly ever known the time since I have been here that any array of figures showing that the Government must lose, or any clear, palpable proof that a thing was unconstitutional, had apparently more than the slightest effect, the effect of a ripple, in preventing the passage of a great scheme which had a good deal of money in it. How that happens I do not know and cannot pretend to say; but such has been my observation of the course of legislation for a very considerable time since I have been a member of the Senate.

Now, sir, from my location, I might be supposed to sympathize a good deal with the honorable Senators from the Pacific coast on this question. I believe they lay it down as a principle that everything that goes to the Pacific coast is right, in the first place, and constitutional in the second, and that it will not do for one of them to vote against it, under any circumstances, no matter what the argument is, because, if they did that, they would be opposing the interests of the Pacific coast; that is to say, they would not be coming up to the standing point on all occasions. They are very clever gentlemen, and I have very great respect and regard for them; but it seems they must stand by their section of country, no matter what the cost to the Government and no matter what the result. It is a Pacific coast measure; ergo, it is right; ergo, it is constitutional; ergo, it must be adopted. All this is very acute logic, no doubt; I do not pretend to complain of it; I only say that I am unable to appreciate it, so far as I am concerned.

If this road is ever to be built—and I take it it will be some day or other—it is to be of more advantage on this side of the line to New England comparatively than to any other section of the old country, because there it will terminate substantially; and if beneficial to New England it will be particularly so to what was once the beautiful city in which I happen to live, for that is the terminus of the Grand Trunk railway, and would be substantially the terminus of this road on the Atlantic coast and it would help to make it a great city. Hence I should be exceedingly glad to have it done at an early day. I do not know but that I might say that personally, if I should live long enough, I might be almost as much interested as an individual in the result as most men who live there, for the reason that at present I am unfortunate enough to own a great many town lots which I can hardly carry, pressing me to the earth, and I should very much like a chance to sell them for a good price.

But, sir, in spite of all this, I cannot give my assent to this bill, more especially at the present time. I am very sorry to be placed in so disagreeable a predicament; but after all it is one of those cases in a man's life where he must meet the necessity of the occasion and act up to his convictions.

Mr. President, I did not vote for the Pacific railroad bill. I believe there were five votes against it in this body, and one or two members did not vote at all. I came into the Senate purposely out of my committee-room in order to throw my vote against the bill, but my colleague persuaded me not to do it. He said it was no use; the thing would go through; it was not a pleasant predicament to be in so small a company, and I had better say nothing about it. I concluded to let it go. The reason why I did not vote for that bill was not that I was not in favor of a Pacific railroad and would not have voted for a Pacific railroad bill if it had been got up according to my ideas of what was honest and true in such a policy. If the Government had fixed upon an initial point within its own territory, as near to any State as it saw fit, and surveyed the line and ascertained it to be a good line, and that it was feasible and the best, in the judgment of competent persons, to make a grand railroad line to the Pacific ocean, I should have voted for it and for any expenditure that was necessary to accomplish it. But when I saw that the effort was to make three lines, one north, one central, and one south—and I presume it never would have been carried if the southerners had not gone out, so as to let the extremes southern line break down—and then when I saw we must make three terminating in the States, one up somewhere in Iowa, another through Missouri, and another somewhere else, I do not exactly know where, but three long railroads running through the States, taking the public lands in the States in addition to a grant of the public money, thus bringing diverse interests together and combining them upon the principle, "You tickle my toe and I will tickle your elbow," without much reference to where the line should be for Government purposes, I regarded it as a mere scheme and bargain, one that ought not to be made, and one that I would not give my assent to under any circumstances. So I did not vote for it.

This is the second step in what was attempted at that time. That was to make three railroads to the Pacific substantially at the expense of the Government. The Government has undertaken—for it is substantially that—to make one great railroad; and we passed a bill the other day, which I was not in favor of, changing that measure in some degree so as to run a parallel line for a considerable distance—a bill which, it is said, came near being vetoed, and I should have justified the veto, if there had been one, so far as my vote was concerned. But what is this? We have a northern frontier, for the greater part a wilderness; settlements have not gone there to any considerable extent; but it is a rich country. We have already contracted to build a central railroad, decided upon the route and the point of beginning, and have put the credit of the Government into it, having contracted to pay so much per mile. That runs for the most part through a wilderness, but is justified by the necessity of connecting the two oceans together. Since that time we have accumulated an enormous debt, a debt that we are taxing the people heavily to pay. Do gentlemen imagine that our credit both at home and abroad is to stand everything? It is as much as we can do to sustain our credit as it is, and it is as much as the people can bear to pay taxes in order to sustain that credit. We have this great central enterprise upon us. It is all that is necessary for the purposes of the Government. That obligation which is upon us goes in part to swell the sum of the debt for which we are responsible, and so far to operate upon the credit of the Government; but notwithstanding that it is just in its inception, we are just beginning it, and we have got that burden to carry.

Notwithstanding this and the enormous debt that is upon us, I have been astonished at the readiness of Congress to assume other and increased obligations. Sir, to this day we do not know and cannot know what the amount of the debt of this Government is, because we have not settled up the claims of this war. It is only within a few days that an obligation, which it is contended we took upon ourselves to pay for negroes who enlisted in the war in several of the States, has come upon us from the honorable Senator from Kentucky, who moved to add to one bill an appropriation of $10,000,000 for the purpose of paying that claim. I am not certain that that is not right. The impression seems to be that that obligation exists. If so, we have got to meet it. In the House of Representatives, not long since, a bill was passed which, if it becomes a law, will take $200,000,000 out of the Treasury, confessedly, on the pretense of equalizing the bounties of our soldiers; that is to say, paying a debt which we never contracted, never promised to pay, and never expected to pay, and it passed the House with only two or three dissenting voices, as I understand. Several members of the House have told me that they were exceedingly ashamed of it, and that if the question could have been taken without reference to the pressure brought from outside on their minds, they did not believe it could have got twenty votes, though I suppose they were mistaken in that respect. That bill, if it ever passes the two Houses, in my judgment, should have a new title, and that is, "A bill to pay the expenses of electing Senators and Representatives of the United States out of the public Treasury." That is about the character of it. That is one item of two hundred millions.

Now, here comes in a proposition just at this period when all these debts are upon us, when all these unsettled claims are upon us, and these other propositions to increase the amount of the debt are upon us, for what purpose? To do anything for the benefit of the Government? To meet any Government necessities? Not at all, except on the principle laid down here the other day, as a great discovery in modern finance, that a man who is deeply in debt must pitch in head over heels in order to pay it—increase his obligations as much and as fast as possible in order to get means to pay his debts! When there is no Government necessity, when we have already contracted to build one line of railroad to the Pacific coast, enough for every Government purpose and answering every Government necessity, a road which is not yet completed, here is a proposition to build another line, substantially, and the Government is to become the indorser of the contracts which may be made in order to carry it into execution, to the amount of $114,000,000, it is said.

But, say gentlemen, the Government is not to pay the principal; it is only to pay the interest. Well, if I have got to pay the interest on a certain amount of money, I consider myself, generally, in debt to that amount, whatever it may be. If I have to pay the interest on $5,000 every year I think I owe $5,000 whether I ever expect to pay it or not. There was a great deal of pertinency and a great deal of his customary keenness in the observation of my honorable friend from Wisconsin [Mr. Howe] just now, that here, on the supposition that this road is to cost $150,000,000, the company in its goodness, to which we have given forty-seven million acres of lands to build it, consents that we shall have one fourth of the net profits to secure our payment of interest on $95,000,000, while they retain the other three fourths to secure themselves the interest of $55,000,000. A very liberal proposition!

In fact, we are to build the road by our credit, for it is ours—they have not any—and to become responsible to that amount and to trust luck for the future. The road is to run through what is a wilderness now, and must remain comparatively so for a great series of years, not, to be sure, so long as it would be if we did nothing in that section of country. It is true the road will extend our settlements, and we shall secure another line to the Pacific ocean; but we are to undertake this before we have completed the first one to which we are pledged, and before we have made anything more than a barely appreciable progress in building it.

Now, sir, what will the moneyed world think of us as financiers? What will they think of this reckless legislation, piling on $100,000,000 here or $200,000,000 there, $10,000,000 here and $20,000,000 there? We had a scheme up the other day which I should be in favor of if it could be properly and decently done, and that is a ship-canal around the falls of Niagara. That bill began with a cost of $6,000,000, to end, I suppose, with $60,000,000 or $100,000,000.

At this time, with so much on our hands to do, the idea that Government should undertake the new enterprise of indorsing paper for schemes that are got up, to the amount of $150,000,000, to begin in a new country to build a second railroad to the Pacific, strikes me as about the strongest and strangest proposition that could be entertained and indulged in by sensible men who are looking out for the true interests of their whole country, the preservation of its credit, and the preservation of its reputation for sense and common, decent, prudent management, that I ever heard of in my life. I dare say I am mistaken, because I am not a business man. I do not understand these matters or how they are to be arranged. I confess I do not see how you are to make so much money by engaging in this business. I do not understand how we are to increase our credit by connecting ourselves with schemes of this kind, when they are not absolutely necessarily called for by any public necessity. It is a new idea to me, and being a new idea to me, it is not possible that I can give my assent to it at present. Now, sir, I know something about the way this has gone on. I will say to the Senator from Oregon that no matter whether there was authority to make a contract or not, I happen to know that it was the great boast of this company to whom the land grant was made that they asked no money.

Mr. SHERMAN. It was actually inserted in the bill itself in these words:

"No money shall be drawn from the Treasury of the United States to aid in the construction of said Northern Pacific railroad."

Mr. FESSENDEN. I know that was the great boast; it was the great argument at the time. I did not pay any sort of regard to it, because I had heard the same promise before in other cases and had seen it violated; and I had seen the Senate agree to the violation so many times in small matters that I supposed the same rule would apply to great ones. I tried it here once on the question of the Agricultural Bureau. My friend from Ohio, with whom I agree on this question, thought we ought to establish an Agricultural Bureau. He told us it would not take a dollar, it would only be making that branch an independent bureau; the farmers wanted it; only the usual $60,000 appropriation would be needed; no more money would be required. Next year the appropriation was $150,000, and I do not know how much it is this year.

Mr. SHERMAN. About the same. That is modest.

Mr. FESSENDEN. I merely give that as an illustration of what reliance is to be placed on the statements of gentlemen as to what these things cost. They make them recklessly; they make them carelessly; I will not say they make them regardless whether they be true or not so that they accomplish their purpose; but the result is inevitable; it is always to burden the Treasury more or less. I never knew it to fail yet, and so it will be in this case as in others.

Now, sir, I should be exceedingly glad to have this road made. I believed originally that it was the best route, not perhaps for business purposes, but the best route to make a railroad over, because I paid some attention to the reports that were made, those great big volumes of which we have heard so much, and I came to the conclusion that the northern route was the best route. I had no idea that the road would go there, because there were not interests enough to carry it in that direction, and perhaps in a business point of view, as we were to build but one road, it was right to select a central line. I will not undertake to decide a question of that importance.

But, to go back, I know that when the charter was given to this company the statements were made and the arguments were addressed to Senators that they wanted no money, that land was all they asked. That was two years ago, and now comes in this proposition that the Government in fact shall build the road, and in my judgment if this bill passes the road will be wholly built upon our credit, and a very handsome surplus will be left to be divided among the projectors and the men interested, because it is enormous in amount and enormous in character. I read the bill with perfect astonishment, my attention being called to it, and my astonishment has not ceased to grow the more I have considered it. The time will come undoubtedly when in the progress of this nation this road will be built; but I beg gentlemen to consider this: it is an old saying that Rome was not built in a day; but it seems to be the idea of Congress nowadays that this country is to be built in a day, that nothing is to be left for the future, that we are to go on into every place where we imagine a thing ought to be done, without reference to the population, without reference to the actual necessities of the country, plunge ourselves in debt to any amount asked for to carry on great public works. Why should they not be graduated according to our means? Now that we have such an immense debt upon us and so many obligations, why should we be in such a hurry, in advance of the interests of the country, in advance of anything that is demanded by the Government itself for its own purposes, to increase these burdens? Why should we increase our responsibilities so that the men who look at us with reference to financial matters will be alarmed at the character of our legislation? If we do an unwise thing to-day, men of sense will say that we may do an equally unwise thing to-morrow. If with a debt of $3,000,000,000 upon us we shall recklessly and without any necessity add three or four hundred millions more to that debt, as is proposed by the legislation of this Congress taking it altogether, it is to be expected that we shall do the same the next session, and the next, and the next; and men will be likely to say that we are apt to do it whenever schemes are brought in.

I know from experience that any word I could say in reference to these matters is of no avail at all. When I talk about the public money and the necessity of looking out for our public credit and for the Treasury, if there is a thing to be done that gentlemen want done, they are not content to defer to the condition of the Treasury. They differ from me, as they have a right to do. I shall be happy to know, if these things are done, that they are done right, and that I have been behind the age, old fogged, not up to the requirements of the time, and really was mistaken in the views that I entertained; but I fear that it may not be so. If it turns out to be so, it will be like some other things in our country; because this is a country of great surprises; it disappoints everybody; everything seems to turn out here differently from common experience the world over, owing to our energy and our power and the peculiarities that are connected with us. I hope it may be so in this case, but I fear, and while I fear as much as I do in reference to this matter I cannot consent to vote for a bill of this kind. Nothing but necessity, the belief of a necessity, would ever induce me to vote to connect the Government with speculations of this sort. I think our Government was not made for any such purpose. It was made more for the purpose of developing the energies of the men who are in it, so far as it had anything of that sort to do, than of aiding to do it by money, letting them alone and letting private enterprise, guided by intelligence such as we have, go ahead and open the resources of the country. I believe that we shall do more harm than we shall good, as a general rule, and that the money will be wasted, when we undertake to take all this business out of the hands of the people and apply the funds of the Government, paid in by the people for other purposes, to projects of this description, unless they are at the time necessary for the purposes of the Government itself.

For these reasons I shall vote against this bill, either at this session or any other until, I was about to say, a sufficient time has elapsed to render it necessary; but when that time arrives I shall not be here.

FREEDMEN'S BUREAU—VETO MESSAGE.

The following message was received from the House of Representatives, by Mr. McPHERSON, its Clerk:

Mr. President, I am directed to inform the Senate that the President of the United States having returned to the House of Representatives in which it originated the bill (H. R. No. 613) entitled "An act to continue in force and to amend an act to establish a Bureau for the Relief of Freedmen and Refugees, and for other purposes," with his objections thereto, the House of Representatives proceeded in pursuance of the Constitution to reconsider the same, and have passed said bill by a vote of two thirds of the House.

Mr. WILSON. I move that the Senate now proceed to the consideration of the Freedmen's Bureau bill returned with the objections of the President.

Mr. HOWARD. I will consent to that very cheerfully, provided the bill which I now have in charge is not displaced in consequence. I am willing to lay it aside informally for the purpose of taking up the measure alluded to by the Senator from Massachusetts, but I should not like to have the bill lose its place.

Mr. JOHNSON. Is it the object of the honorable member from Massachusetts to have the subject of the veto message disposed of to-day?

Mr. WILSON. Yes, sir.

Mr. JOHNSON. To take the vote to-day?

Mr. WILSON. Yes, sir. The House have acted on it.

Mr. JOHNSON. The House may do a great many things that we will not do. I have not seen the message, do not know what it is.

Mr. SUMNER and Mr. TRUMBULL. It will be read.

Mr. JOHNSON. It will be read, of course; but I do not see any particular occasion for pressing this more than another veto message which has been upon our table for the last two months.

Mr. WILSON. Well, let us take the vote.

Mr. JOHNSON. I ask whether this is a privileged question, or whether a Senator has a right to object to the consideration of it now.

I only want to have it put off until to-morrow, to look at it.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. It has no priority over other questions unless by the vote of the Senate.

Mr. JOHNSON. I object, then, and move that it be postponed until to-morrow.

Mr. TRUMBULL. I presume that the Senator from Maryland has no objection to having the message read.

Mr. JOHNSON. None in the world.

Mr. TRUMBULL. We can take it up and have it read; and afterward, if we think proper not to consider it now, that is another question. The other day, I recollect, when a message came in, it was insisted that it should be read that day, and I think we staid here to a very late hour one day to have it read.

Mr. JOHNSON. But, as well as I recollect, my friend from Illinois thought it ought not to be read and need not be read.

Mr. TRUMBULL. No; I never insisted that it ought not to be read. We have always read such messages.

Mr. JOHNSON. I do not think you insisted upon its being read; at any rate you acquiesced in what the Senate did. I have not the slightest objection to its being read now, unless the reading of it so brings it before the Senate that it must be considered to-day.

Mr. TRUMBULL. It is necessarily before the Senate, of course.

Mr. JOHNSON. What I desire is that the message be printed, and that we dispose of it to-morrow. It will make very little difference, so far as the measure itself is concerned, whether it is disposed of now or disposed of to-morrow; but I think it is due to those who have not seen the message—and I suppose none of the Senators have seen it—that they should have an opportunity of considering it.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. There being a bill before the Senate, no other subject can be taken up, except by unanimous consent.

Mr. WILSON. I move to postpone the present bill and all other business in order to take up the message from the House of Representatives communicating the veto.

The motion was agreed to.

The action of the House of Representatives was read:

Several SENATORS. Now let the veto message be read.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The message of the President of the United States, returning House bill No. 613 will be read, with his objections.

The Secretary read the message, as follows:

To the House of Representatives:

A careful examination of the bill passed by the two Houses of Congress entitled "An act to continue in force and to amend an act to establish a Bureau for the Relief of Freedmen and Refugees, and for other purposes," has convinced me that the legislation which it proposes would not be consistent with the welfare of the country, and that it falls clearly within the reasons assigned in my message of the 19th of February last, returning without my signature, a similar measure which originated in the Senate. It is not my purpose to repeat the objections which I then urged. They are yet fresh in your recollection, and can be readily examined as a part of the records of one branch of the national Legislature. Adhering to the principle set forth in that message, I now reaffirm them, and the line of policy therein indicated.

The only ground upon which this kind of legislation can be justified is that of the war-making power. The act of which this bill was intended as amendatory was passed during the existence of the war. By its own provisions it is to terminate within one year from the cessation of hostilities and the declaration of peace. It is therefore yet in existence, and it is likely that it will continue in force as long as the freedmen may require the benefit of its provisions. It will certainly remain in operation as a law until some months subsequent to the meeting of the next session of Congress, when, if experience shall make evident the necessity of additional legislation, the two Houses will have ample time to mature and pass the requisite measures. In the mean time the questions arise, why should this war measure be continued beyond the period designated in the original act; and why, in time of peace, should military tribunals be created to continue until each "State shall be fully restored in its constitutional relations to the Government, and shall be duly represented in the Congress of the United States?" It was manifest, with respect to the act approved March 3, 1865, that prudence and wisdom alike required that jurisdiction over all cases concerning the free enjoyment of the immunities and rights of citizenship, as well as the protection of person and property, should be conferred upon some tribunal in every State or district where the ordinary course of judicial proceeding was interrupted by the rebellion, and until the same should be fully restored. At that time, therefore, an urgent necessity existed for the passage of some such law. Now, however, the war has substantially ceased; the ordinary course of judicial proceedings is no longer interrupted; the courts, both State and Federal, are in full, complete, and successful operation, and through them every person, regardless of race and color, is entitled to and can be heard. The protection granted to the white citizen is already conferred by law upon the freedmen; strong and stringent guards, by way of penalties and punishments, are thrown around his person and property, and it is believed that ample protection will be afforded him by due process of law, without resort to the dangerous expedient of "military tribunals," now that the war has been brought to a close.

The necessity no longer existing for such tribunals, which had their origin in the war, grave objections to their continuance must present themselves to the minds of all reflecting and dispassionate men. Independently of the danger in representative republics of conferring upon the military in time of peace extraordinary powers—so carefully guarded against by the patriots and statesmen of the earlier days of the Republic, so frequently the ruin of Governments founded upon the same free principle, and subversive of the rights and liberties of the citizen, the question of practical economy earnestly commends itself to the consideration of the law-making power. With an immense debt already burdening the incomes of the industrial and laboring classes, a due regard for their interests, so inseparably connected with the welfare of the country, should prompt us to rigid economy and retrenchment, and influence us to abstain from all legislation that would unnecessarily increase the public indebtedness. Tested by this rule of sound political wisdom, I can see no reason for the establishment of the "military jurisdiction" conferred upon the officials of the bureau by the fourteenth section of the bill.

By the laws of the United States, and of the different States, competent courts, Federal and State, have been established and are now in full practical operation. By means of these civil tribunals, ample redress is afforded for all private wrongs, whether to the person or the property of the citizen, without denial or unnecessary delay. They are open to all, without regard to color or race. I feel well assured that it will be better to trust the rights, privileges, and immunities of the citizen to tribunals thus established, and presided over by competent and impartial judges, bound by fixed rules of law and evidence, and where the right of trial by jury is guaranteed and secured, than to the caprice and judgment of an officer of the bureau, who, it is possible, may be entirely ignorant of the principles that underlie the just administration of the law. There is danger, too, that conflict of jurisdiction will frequently arise between the civil courts and these military tribunals, each having concurrent jurisdiction over the person and the cause of action—the one judicature administered and controlled by civil law, the other by the military. How is the conflict to be settled, and who is to determine between the two tribunals when it arises? In my opinion it is wise to guard against such conflict by leaving to the courts and juries the protection of all civil rights and the redress of all civil grievances.

The fact cannot be denied that since the actual cessation of hostilities many acts of violence, such perhaps as had never been witnessed in their previous history, have occurred in the States involved in the recent rebellion. I believe, however, that public sentiment will sustain me in the assertion that such deeds of wrong are not confined to any particular State or section, but are manifested over the entire country, demonstrating that the cause that produced them does not depend upon any particular locality, but is the result of the agitation and derangement incident to a long and bloody civil war. While the prevalence of such disorders must be greatly deplored, their occasional and temporary occurrence would seem to furnish no necessity for the extension of the bureau beyond the period fixed in the original act. Besides the objections which I have thus briefly stated, I may urge upon your consideration the additional reason that recent developments in regard to the practical operations of the bureau in many of the States show that in numerous instances it is used by its agents as a means of promoting their individual advantage; and that the freedmen are employed for the advancement of the personal ends of the officers, instead of their own improvement and welfare, thus confirming the fears originally entertained by many that the continuation of such a bureau for any unnecessary length of time would inevitably result in fraud, corruption, and oppression.

It is proper to state that in cases of this character investigations have been promptly ordered, and the offender punished whenever his guilt has been satisfactorily established. As another reason against the necessity of the legislation contemplated by this measure reference may be had to the "civil rights bill," now a law of the land, and which will be faithfully executed as long as it shall remain unreppealed and may not be declared unconstitutional by courts of competent jurisdiction. By that act it is enacted "that all persons born in the United States and not subject to any foreign Power, excluding Indians not taxed, are hereby declared to be citizens of the United States; and such citizens, of every race and color, without regard to any previous condition of slavery or involuntary servitude, except as a punishment for crime whereof the party shall have been duly convicted, shall have the same right in every State and Territory in the United States, to make and enforce contracts, to sue, to be parties, and give evidence, to inherit, purchase, lease, sell, hold, and convey real and personal property, and to full and equal benefit of all laws and proceedings for the security of person and property, as is enjoyed by white citizens, and shall be subject to like punishment, pains, and penalties, and to none other, any law, statute, ordinance, regulation, or custom to the contrary notwithstanding."

By the provisions of the act full protection is afforded, through the districts courts of the United States, to all persons injured, and whose privileges, as there declared, are in any way impaired; and heavy penalties are denounced against the person who willfully violates the law. I need not state that that law did not receive my approval; yet its remedies are far preferable to those proposed in the present bill; the one being civil and the other military.

By the sixth section of the bill herewith returned, certain proceedings by which the lands in the "parishes of St. Helena and St. Luke, South Carolina," were sold and bid in, and afterward disposed of by the tax commissioners, are ratified and confirmed. By the seventh, eighth, ninth, tenth, and eleventh sections, provisions by law are made for the disposal of the lands thus acquired to a particular class of citizens. While the quieting of titles is deemed very important and desirable the discrimination made in the bill seems objectionable, as does also the attempt to confer upon the commissioners judicial powers, by which citizens of the United States are to be deprived of their property in a mode contrary to that provision of the Constitution which declares that no person "shall be deprived of life, liberty, or property without due process of law." As a general principle such legislation is unsafe, unwise, partial, and unconstitutional. It may deprive persons of their property who are equally deserving objects of the nation's bounty as those whom by this legislation Congress seeks to benefit. The title to the land thus to be portioned out to a favored class of citizens must depend upon the regularity of the tax sale under the law as it existed at the time of the sale, and no subsequent legislation can give validity to the rights thus acquired as against the original claimants. The attention of Congress is therefore invited to a more mature consideration of the measures proposed in these sections of the bill.

In conclusion, I again urge upon Congress the danger of class legislation, so well calculated to keep the public mind in a state of uncertain expectation, disquiet, and restlessness, and to encourage interested hopes and fears that the national Government will continue to furnish to classes of citizens in the several States means for support and maintenance, regardless of whether they pursue a life of indolence or of labor, and regardless also of the constitutional limitations of the national authority in times of peace and tranquillity.

The bill is herewith returned to the House of Representatives, in which it originated, for its final action. ANDREW JOHNSON.

WASHINGTON, July 16, 1866.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The bill is now before the Senate, and by the provisions of the Constitution is reconsidered. The question is, Shall the bill pass, the objections of the President notwithstanding?

Mr. JOHNSON. I move that the matter be postponed until to-morrow and made the special order at one o'clock, and that in the mean time the message be printed.

The question being put, the negative appeared to prevail.

Mr. JOHNSON called for the yeas and nays, and they were ordered, and being taken, resulted—yeas 18, nays 31; as follows:

YEAS—Messrs. Buckalew, Davis, Doolittle, Foster, Guthrie, Hendricks, Johnson, McDougall, Nesmith, Norton, Riddle, Saulsbury, and Van Winkle—13.

NAYS—Messrs. Anthony, Brown, Chandler, Conness, Creswell, Edmunds, Fessenden, Grimes, Harris, Henderson, Howard, Howe, Kirkwood, Lane of Indiana, Morgan, Morrill, Nye, Poland, Pomeroy, Ramsey, Sherman, Sprague, Stewart, Sumner, Trumbull, Wade, Willey, Williams, Wilson, and Yates—31.

ABSENT—Messrs. Clark, Cowan, Dixon, Lane of Kansas, and Wright—8.

Mr. HENDRICKS. Mr. President, no argument that could be presented would probably change the result of the vote of the Senate; yet, sir, I feel it to be my duty to say that I approve the sentiments of the veto message which has just been read. I think, sir, upon principle, as well as upon experience, we are justified in saying that a system such as the Freedmen's Bureau is necessarily vicious and can only produce evil.

It is a measure that places the labor of one section of the country under the control of a few. If we could say that all men are entirely honest and virtuous, then we should be safe in placing the labor of such a large class of persons under the control of a few; but when we know that where power is given to men without sufficient and sure restraints and control upon their conduct frauds and corruption must be the result, we are justified, I think, upon principle in saying that a system like this is vicious. We have not very satisfactory evidence, perhaps, upon the practical workings of the bureau. We have some evidence; we have the evidence communicated to the Senate in the early part of the session in a communication made by General Grant to the President, which the President communicated to Congress, in which General Grant says that in many localities, at least in some localities, the affairs of the bureau are mismanaged. We have the reports of Generals Steedman and Fullerton upon the subject, and I say that so much wrong and so much corruption is not developed in any other report that has been made to Congress for the last two sessions.

An effort has been made in the country to depreciate that report by attacks upon the distinguished gentlemen who gathered the facts and communicated them to the President. That effort I think has not been successful. The report made by these two generals has commanded to a very large extent the confidence of the country, whatever action Congress may take upon this question. But, sir, very recently I observed in a journal of great weight and influence with some gentlemen a communication, the veracity and verity of which they cannot question, which sustains the report of Generals Steedman and Fullerton; and being justified somewhat by the example of the distinguished Senator from Massachusetts, I will read from this communication. It is found in a newspaper. This communication is dated Boston, June 18, 1866, and is signed "James Redpath," and is published as reliable in the National Anti-Slavery Standard. Ordinarily this paper does not have so much weight with me, [laughter,] but as evidence against the gentlemen who claim it to be authority, I read it. This writer says that he accompanied General Steedman, who was inspecting the operations of the Freedmen's Bureau, on a raid into Alabama, and then he goes on to mention some things that took place through that raid. That was during the war. He says:

"Let me say a few words about General Steedman. He belongs, honestly and heartily, to the President's party. He has gone so far and no further, and therefore he is neither a traitor nor a renegade. The same views which we denounce in the President to-day the general advocated, privately and vehemently, three years ago. I regretted and combated these views then, as I do now; but neither then nor since have I seen cause to brand either the President or the general as a traitor. Butler alone excepted, I know none of our generals who were so 'rough' on traitors as this Steedman. General Saxton was as true as Wendell Phillips is; yet neither of these eminent men ever hated a rebel. Their culture and character forbade hate. But Steedman was a terrible hater. Now, do not let us forget his past services in criticising his reports. If he is not just, we can well afford to be. And although I do not come forward to defend General Steedman, I feel impelled in justice to say that the same reports which he gave from North Carolina were made to me by men whom he did not see—men of unquestionable veracity, whose labors were among negroes, and who are as much devoted to their cause as you or I. To one of these gentlemen I said, 'It is only the radicals who support the bureau in the North.' He answered, 'If the radicals knew how the bureau is conducted in this State they would not support it.' I heard many stories in that State which staggered my faith in the utility of the bureau. It was only when I reached South Carolina and found how faithfully and well General Saxton guarded the rights of the negroes that I yielded my fast-growing belief that the bureau had better be abolished—in the interest of the freedmen."

"Again, I believe that there are several States in which it would be better for all parties, black and white, for the bureau to be abolished. How is it in Alabama, for example, and Arkansas and Georgia as a whole? If half the stories I have heard are true—stories told by anti-slavery men—the bureau in those States is an ally of the rebels."

Then he goes on to speak of the treatment General Saxton has received at the hands of the General Government. That part of it does not bear necessarily on the question before the Senate, and therefore I will not read it. He adds a postscript:

"P. S. I sent for this letter, after I had mailed it to you, because I found that I had omitted to show without possibility of misinterpretation, that I believed the commissioners had done a great wrong to General Saxton. At the same time I wished to add, that in my opinion, 'the President's spies,' as you call them, have rendered a valuable service to the bureau. It won't do, my dear sir, to defend bureau officers who cultivate plantations. This fact necessarily identifies their interests with the planters. This is not an opinion formed in my library; it is the result of my observations in the field. Let me add emphatically, since I see that you have praised General Whittlesey, that this opinion was forced on me in North Carolina, and that I believe that you are entirely in error respecting the anti-slavery character of that officer. In my opinion he should have been discharged long ago, for either he is no friend to the negro or he is an inefficient officer. Teachers and others in North Carolina give evidence on this point too emphatic to be slighted. And I saw with my own eyes, and heard with my own ears too much that sickened me in North Carolina to be willing to reverse my impressions even in the face of your kindly mention of General Whittlesey.

"It is not the bureau that protects the negro; it is the presence of the military forces. I fear that our future history will show that the anti-slavery people erred in consenting to the existence of the bureau beyond the end of the war. Why? It is a compromise. It is not patronage that the negro wants, but justice. Enact impartial suffrage and the bureau may safely be abolished. But while it exists timid Republicans will gladly avail themselves of it to quiet their consciences and constituencies."

I shall not read the whole of the letter. Mr. President, I have referred to this communication from one of the most prominent anti-slavery men of the country, published in one of the most earnest anti-slavery journals of the country, as evidence that the report of Generals Steedman and Fullerton is true; not a matter of opinion given by this writer, but a statement of facts upon his own observation and knowledge of facts which he gathered in the country where the bureau has its field of operations, a statement of facts which he says made him sick at the outrages perpetrated by the agents of this bureau upon the blacks themselves, forcing upon him the conviction that the bureau ought to be abandoned in the interests of the freedmen.

I know, sir, that when the question comes up between a veto of the President and the Senate, even this communication will probably not control any votes; but it is right that this should be made somewhat public to the country when we now, against the reasons given by the President, fasten upon the country and the country's burdened Treasury an engine of oppression and corruption. I say that nowhere in the world is it safe to place one set of men in their labor under the control of a few. What are the facts? That in whole States the men who control the negroes by the thousands become interested in the cultivation of plantations; they become interested in cheap labor and the high price of productions; they become interested in a system and policy that restores the negro to slavery without imposing upon the master the responsibility and the interest of his protection. Under the old system the master had an interest in taking care of the slave, in feeding and clothing him well that he might be a useful property to him. But under this system the Freedmen's Bureau agent who becomes interested in the cultivation of plantations becomes interested in making for the year the most possible out of the labor which he controls with a power that is not restrained by any letter or word in the Freedmen's Bureau act. What is your definition of his power? What is your restraint upon his conduct? You simply say that there shall be a Freedmen's Bureau to "take charge of" the freedmen. What sort of a definition of power is that? Would you place the white men of this country under the control of an agency the power of which is defined by such power as that—"to take charge of?" What does that mean? What may he do? What may he not do? What is he doing? What he may not do no Senator from the language creating this bureau can say. What he ought to do, one Senator may give one opinion upon and another Senator a very different opinion. General Grant says that because of the difference of opinions among the different agents of this bureau the affairs of this bureau are managed very differently in different localities; while if you had a law that well defined the power and well restricted the exercise of that power you would have some uniformity in the conduct of the bureau's agents; but you have no such law. You have a general declaration that this bureau through its agents shall take charge of four million people. Do Senators say that that is a safe law? Would you enact such a law as that as a constitution and form of government for any set of white men in the world?

Would you say to the people of Montana, now perhaps thirty or forty thousand in number, we will appoint a Governor and secretary of state to take charge of you, and that shall be the limit and definition of their power? Among statesmen it is regarded as of the first importance when a government is established that its power shall be accurately defined and sufficiently restrained. It is the boast of our form of Government that the Constitution defines its power and restrains the officers in the exercise of those powers by well-expressed limitations; and when you come to establish a government for four millions of negroes, a government that not only touches the negroes, but reaches over upon the white people in their intercourse with the negroes—for such a government you consider it sufficient and safe and right to say in general terms that the agents who may be appointed by General Howard shall take charge of these people. When Whittlesey and his subordinates compelled these poor people to work for their profits; when they are amassing large fortunes out of the sweat of the negroes, they will say to you, "We have taken charge of them." They have not gone outside the letter of their authority, and they have not departed from the form of government that you gave them. That is, they have taken charge of them. They have taken charge of them and worked them that they and their families may grow rich; and you say that is for the safety of this country!

When the President of the United States informs us that such a system has resulted in fraud and corruption, it is not a matter of surprise, for such is the frailty of human nature, that if you give one man the unrestricted power of control over a large number, and he has the power to work them according to his pleasure, that there shall be fraud and corruption of course every one would expect. It is the history of the race that under such circumstances there will be fraud. To prevent it we establish our system of laws, restraints, and qualifications.

Then, sir, we have not only the assurance that we gather from human nature itself, from the loose character of the law that created this bureau, from the want of restraint and limitation upon the power of the officers of the bureau, but from the testimony of General Grant, from the testimony of Generals Steedman and Fullerton, and now from the testimony of the highest anti-slavery authority in the United States, that there is fraud, that there is corruption, that there is outrage under this bureau; and yet you are asked to pass a law over the veto of the President giving very strong reasons why the bill should not pass, to continue this bureau for two years longer. Where is the evidence that this bureau has in reality protected the black man anywhere? Where is a satisfactory assurance upon that subject? You have to rely for that testimony upon the agents themselves. Whittlesey, in North Carolina, who is well described by Redpath in his communication of last month, would tell you that his department is a model of government; that nothing like it is to be found on earth; that the negroes are happy as princes, and the white people as contented as lords. All is going on well, he would tell you, while the secret is that his subordinates have the opportunity to become rich under the operations of the bureau which he controls.

Mr. President, I shall regret to see this law continued for two years longer. Surely Senators know very well that there are in this bill several sections regulating real estate in the southern States, and that the bill in regard to those sections was only considered for a few hours in the Senate, and I venture to say outside the committee who examined the bill in the committee-room, there is no Senator here who can state what are the provisions of the bill in regard to the real estate which it reaches. You have a general idea that it confirms certain tax titles; you have a general idea that it relates to the lands set apart to the negroes by General Sherman; but what the provisions are, how it adjudges title, where it makes a title right that ought to be so, I think the Senators here have not that sort of information that they ought to have in passing a bill of this importance.

This bureau, as is suggested by the President in his message, is to continue for several months yet. I think it has done evil enough and little enough of good to justify us in abandoning it when it shall cease to exist according to the original provisions of the law creating it.

One suggestion more, Mr. President, and I shall leave this question, hoping not to refer to it again in the Senate. It is claimed that the negroes are citizens of the United States; that we have made them citizens by virtue of the civil rights bill, as it is called. If they are citizens, how is it that we can set over them a government peculiar in its framework, entirely unknown to the Constitution, not contemplated or thought of by the fathers? By virtue of what authority in the Constitution is it that you send an agent of a bureau down into Georgia to make and control a contract made by a citizen? Can you send an agent of this Government into Indiana to control me or my constituents in the making of their contracts? Every one says no. If I am a citizen I make my own contracts. I am free to regulate them according to my own pleasure. Then you say, and you enacted it into a law, that the negro is a citizen free as any of us. What! a man free to do everything except to regulate his contracts and his personal service? If he is not free for that, in what respect is he free? And yet you appoint a bureau, with its agents, without any restraint or authority, to control them in the making of their contracts, to force them to work. I saw a very singular order very recently made by one of the bureau officers. He stated that there had come to be within his region such laziness and vagabondism among the colored people that he would put them to work upon the roads—I think that was his language—if they did not return to the farms where they had made contracts to labor, to work out their time. If they did not do that he would put them to work upon the highways. Now, I ask Senators, where is the authority for this in the Constitution of the United States? Where is the authority for any officer of this Government to say that if a white man does not serve out his contract for a year's service, somebody will put him to work on the highways as a matter of punishment? I want to know where is the authority for the establishment within this Government of a system like this.

Mr. President, I feel that I have done my duty in resisting this thing. I believe that the country will sustain the President in his veto. He has sought that these people now made free shall be governed by the laws and the Constitution of the land. He has resisted to the extent of his constitutional power the establishment over them and the white people among whom they are found, of a system of government unknown to the Constitution and to our institutions. He has done his duty, and I believe, sir, that the country will sustain him.

MR. SAULSBURY. Mr. President, if there is anything for which the people of this country ought to thank Andrew Johnson, President of the United States, it is that he has set his face like a flint against the legislation of Congress wholly without constitutional authority, subversive of the principles of the fundamental law of the land, dangerous to the existence of republican principles, and grossly oppressive to the people of the whole country. For such a patriotic service he deserves the thanks of the nation; and I cannot but believe that in view of this extraordinary legislation on the part of Congress, and the firmness with which he meets it, a grateful people will hereafter reward him with its highest honors.

What is the question involved in this case? What is the principle involved? No less a principle than this: has the Congress of the United States the power to take under its charge a portion of the people, discriminating against all others, and put their hand in the public Treasury, take the public money, appropriate it to the support of this particular class of individuals, and tax all the rest of the peo-
